A bill (S. 1847) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the 1937 State convention of the American Legion, Department of Kentucky, to be held at Paris, Ky., during the month of July 1937; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself and Mr. CHAVEZ):

A bill (S. 1848) granting to the State of New Mexico certain lands for the use and benefit of the Carrie Tingley Crippled Children's Hospital; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. NEELY:

A bill (S. 1849) for the relief of the Goldenberg Furniture Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1850) to provide for the appointment of James W. Grose as a sergeant, first class (master sergeant), United States Army; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1851) for the relief of Henry Top; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 1852) granting an increase of pension to John Flanagan;

A bill (S. 1853) granting a pension to Laura Ricketts; and

A bill (S. 1854) granting a pension to James B. West; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MINTON:

A bill (S. 1855) to promote the general welfare of the United States in a comprehensive plan to control destructive floods of the Ohio River and its tributaries, to conserve the soil from erosion, build up forest reserves, preserve wildlife, increase recreational centers with cabin and cottage sites, utilize submarginal lands, expand subsistence farming, extend water navigation and commerce, produce electrical energy for interstate transmission, provide a healthy and cheaper water supply for household and irrigation purposes, control pollution of streams, and to relieve unemployment among the people; to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (S. 1856) for the relief of Francis B. Cornell; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

A bill (S. 1857) granting an increase of pension to Quessie Burns; and

A bill (S. 1858) granting an increase of pension to Minerva C. Smith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BYRD:

A bill (S. 1859) for the relief of Merritt Rea;

A bill (S. 1860) for the relief of the heirs at law of Barnabas W. Baker and Joseph Baker; to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1861) for the relief of Benjamin J. Crockett; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

(Mr. ANDREWS introduced Senate Joint Resolution 100, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 101) to amend the joint resolution establishing the George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission, approved May 23, 1928, as amended; to the Committee on the Library.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT RELATIVE TO THE JUDICIARY

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution for appropriate reference, and ask unanimous consent that it may be read at this time.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 100) proposing an amendment of section 1, article III, of the Constitution of the United States, relating to the judiciary, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to section 1, article III, of the Constitution of the United States relating to the judiciary

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall become a part of article III, section 1, of the Constitution:

"ARTICLE III

"SECTION 1. The judicial powers of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Justices of the Supreme Court and judges of inferior courts shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold their offices during good behavior as herein provided, and shall receive at stated times for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. Any person having held a commission or commissions as Justice of the Supreme Court or judge of an intermediate appellate or district court for at least 10 years continuously or otherwise, may voluntarily retire on full salary upon attaining the age of 70 years, subject to call, however, for such further duties as he may be willing to undertake; and upon attaining the age of 75 years he shall automatically retire and shall during the remainder of his life continue to receive the yearly compensation payable to him at the time of his retirement.

"The Supreme Court shall consist of a Chief Justice and one Associate Justice appointed from territory comprising each of the intermediate appellate courts established by the Congress. No person other than a native-born citizen of the United States shall be appointed a member of the Supreme Court. No person shall be appointed to fill a vacancy in the office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court which shall occur by reason of this amendment or any cause who has not been for 10 years last past an inhabitant of the territory comprising the highest intermediate appellate court from which no incumbent Associate Justice was an inhabitant at the time of his induction to office. A vacancy in the office of Chief Justice may be filled by appointment from any State or the District of Columbia.

"The Supreme Court may exercise its powers and jurisdiction under such rules as it may adopt, and two-thirds of its members shall constitute a quorum. The concurrence of a majority of all members of the Court shall be sufficient to a decision and judgment of the Court: Provided, That no act of Congress shall be adjudged invalid except upon the vote of not less than two-thirds of the whole Court.

"The membership of each intermediate appellate court, ordained and established by the Congress, shall consist of at least one judge from each State included within the territory comprising each such court, one of whom shall be designated by the President as the presiding judge of the court.

"This section shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within 5 years from the date of its submission."

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The following bills and joint resolution were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 4985. An act to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

H. R. 5487. An act to amend section 4551 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 ed., Supp. II, title 46, sec. 643); to the Committee on Commerce.

H. J. Res. 272. Joint resolution to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to accept title for the United States to certain real property to be donated by Mr. Henry Ford and wife for Veterans' Administration facility purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN BITUMINOUS COAL—AMENDMENTS

Mr. ROBINSON. I submit two amendments for appropriate reference. The amendments are identical, but one is intended to be proposed by me to Senate bill 1, and the other to House bill 4985, to regulate interstate commerce in bituminous coal, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments of the Senator from Arkansas will be received, printed, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

DESK AND CHAIR OF THE LATE SENATOR FLETCHER

Mr. PEPPER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 91), which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Whereas the Honorable Duncan U. Fletcher, late a Senator from Florida for a period of 27 consecutive years, used the same desk and chair in his office for many years; and

Whereas the Alumni Association of the University of Florida has earnestly petitioned the Senate that it be permitted to have said desk and chair to be maintained as a memorial to the late Senator Duncan U. Fletcher: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the President of the Senate is authorized to appoint a committee of two Senators to present said desk and chair to the Alumni Association of the University of Florida upon the condition that it be placed in the Union Building of said university at Gainesville, Fla., and be appropriately cared for and maintained as a memorial to the late Senator Duncan U. Fletcher. The transportation of such desk and chair from Washington, D. C., to Gainesville, Fla., shall be without cost to the United States.

NUMBER AND APPORTIONMENT OF CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I submit a resolution calling upon the Civil Service Commission for certain information relative to apportionment, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and lie on the table. I also ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a tabulation issued February 15, 1937, by the Commission relative to apportionment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received and lie on the table; and, without objection, the tabulation presented by the Senator from Arizona will be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution (S. Res. 92) was ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas the rule of apportionment under the Civil Service Act provides that appointments to the public service in the executive departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census; and

Whereas the report of the Civil Service Commission as of February 15, 1937, contains a record of only 39,744 civil-service apportioned appointments in Washington; and

Whereas that number represents less than 10 percent of the total number of Federal employees with civil-service status; and

Whereas of the said 39,744 appointees, 8,989, or 22.6 percent, are residents of the District of Columbia; and

Whereas the reform of the civil-service system and its extension to emergency agencies is under consideration by the Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Civil Service Commission is hereby requested to furnish the Senate the following information:

(1) The total number of employees with civil-service status in Washington, D. C.

(2) The total number of employees with civil-service status engaged in field service outside of Washington.

(3) A statement showing the apportionment by States of all civil-service employees in Washington, including those who have been blanketed into the civil service or secured a status through noncompetitive examination, or in any other manner, according to the legal residence of such employees at the time they were appointed.

(4) A similar statement showing the apportionment by States of all civil-service employees engaged in field service outside of Washington according to the legal residence of such employees at the time they were appointed.

The table presented by Mr. HAYDEN is as follows:

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—LETTER OF SENATOR ASHURST

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I send to the desk a copy of a letter written by the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] to one of his constituents and ask that the clerk may read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

MARCH 12, 1937.

Mr. J. R. LOFGREEN,
Tombstone, Ariz.

DEAR MR. LOFGREEN: Your letter of March 6 received in which you advise that you have heard terrific criticism of me because I am supporting the President's plan to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government and you also complain that I have not replied to your letter dated February 24.

I sympathize with your impatience in not receiving any answer to your former letter and I say in reply that I am working harder now than I have ever worked before; but I am not complaining, for when an officeholder complains of overwork, he is simply proving that he has a task too big for him.

I have been for years a critic, and hope I am able, without making a wry face, to take a small dose of that medicine—criticism—of which I have given other fellows sizable doses; in other words, I not only "ladle it out" but can also "take it." Pardon my dropping into slang, but it conveys my thought precisely.

Copy of the committee hearings will be sent to you.

With kind personal regards.

Sincerely yours,

HENRY F. ASHURST.

FEDERAL EDUCATION AID TO UNDERPRIVILEGED CHILDREN—ADDRESS BY SENATOR PEPPER

[Mr. LEWIS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the subject of Federal Education Aid to Underprivileged Children, delivered by Senator PEPPER on Thursday, Mar. 11, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—STATEMENT OF ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL JACKSON

[Mr. DIETERICH asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the statement made yesterday by Assistant Attorney General Robert H. Jackson before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, which appears in the Appendix.]

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—STATEMENT OF JOHN P. DEVANEY

[Mr. LUNDEEN asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD the statement made today before the Committee on the Judiciary by Hon. John P. Devaney, former chief justice of the State of Minnesota, on the proposed reorganization of the Federal judiciary, which appears in the Appendix.]

JUDICIAL AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION AND GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I respectfully request that I be not interrupted during the course of my remarks or until I shall have finished my statement, at which time I shall be glad to answer, if I can, any questions that may be propounded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska requests that he be not interrupted until he has finished his statement. Senators will please take notice.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States divides the power of Government into three separate and distinct branches, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. So long as these powers are exercised within the respective fields, so long as the representatives of any one branch do not intrude into the field of either of the other two branches, the machinery of government is kept in good running order. On the other hand, when the officials of any one branch go beyond the boundaries of their own field and interfere with the operations of any other branch, there is conflict, disorder, and confusion.

Whether, under our Constitution, the judiciary possessed the power to nullify an act of the Federal Congress because in the opinion of the judiciary such act contravened any provision of the Constitution was for a long time a disputed question. But gradually it assumed this constitutional authority and proceeded to exercise it. Whatever disagreements there may be in the minds of thinking people on this question, I believe it safely can be said that by long years of exercising this authority it has become fairly well established and settled that at the present time our courts have the right to nullify acts of Congress when in the opinion of the judiciary such acts of Congress are unconstitutional.

AN ACT OF CONGRESS SHOULD NOT BE SET ASIDE AS UNCONSTITUTIONAL UNLESS IT IS CLEARLY SO BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT

It is likewise the well-established law that when courts are called upon to settle questions involving this constitutional right the courts should hesitate and be extremely careful lest they exceed their own constitutional power. It is universally conceded by all students of constitutional law that a court should not set aside an act of Congress on the ground that it is inimical to any provision of the Constitution unless it is satisfied that the law in question is unconstitutional beyond all reasonable doubt.

This identical question was passed upon by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in Commonwealth v. Smith (4 Bin. 117), page 123. The court upheld its power to declare a law of the legislature unconstitutional but declined to do so in the case at bar because it was not convinced of its unconstitutionality beyond a reasonable doubt. The court, speaking through Chief Justice Tilghman, said:

For weighty reasons, it has been assumed as a principle, in construing constitutions, by the Supreme Court of the United States, by this court, and every other court of reputation in the United States, that an act of the legislature is not to be declared void, unless the violation of the Constitution is so manifest as to leave no room for reasonable doubt.

Another case directly in point is Ogden v. Saunders (12 Wheat. 213–270). The Judge writing the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States said:

But if I could rest my opinion in favor of the constitutionality of the law on which the question arises, on no other ground than this doubt so felt and acknowledged, that alone, would, in my estimation, be a satisfactory vindication of it. It is but a decent respect due to the wisdom, the integrity and the patriotism of the legislative body, by which any law is passed, to presume in favor of its validity, until its violation of the Constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt.

In the famous Dartmouth College case, reported in Fourth Wheaton, 519, at page 625, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall stated:

On more than one occasion this Court has expressed the cautious circumspection with which it approaches the consideration of such questions, and has declared that in no doubtful case would it pronounce a legislative act to be contrary to the Constitution.

As late as January 1937, Circuit Judge Garrecht, in a dissenting opinion regarding the constitutionality of the act setting up the National Labor Relations Board, called attention to the way in which many courts have refused to follow the universally admitted rule of law in considering the constitutionality of acts of Congress. In his opinion, Circuit Judge Garrecht said:

There is a canon of statutory construction formulated by the courts often more honored in the breach than in the observance that no law should be set aside as unconstitutional unless it was clearly so beyond a reasonable doubt.

Former Justice Clarke, of the Supreme Court, in an article in Ninth American Bar Association Journal, 689 (1923), at page 692, made some very apt allusions to this subject. He said:

It is difficult for men not steeped in legalistic thinking and forms of expression to understand how five Judges can agree that an act of Congress is unconstitutional "beyond rational doubt" and that by "clear and indubitable demonstration" they have shown it to be so, when four of their associates, equally able and experienced Judges, who have heard the same arguments on the same record declare that to them "upon the basis of reason, experience and authority", the validity of the act "seems absolutely free from doubt."

Let us suppose that an experienced man of business wanted to get legal advice as to the constitutionality of certain acts he proposed to do. Suppose such a man consulted nine of the most influential and learned members of the bar. Five of these lawyers advised him that he has no constitutional right to do the thing he contemplates; but four of his advisers, equally learned and equally respected, tell him he has a constitutional right to pursue his contemplated action.

Does any man believe that his mind would be free from reasonable doubt? Does it not irresistibly follow, whatever may be his desires, that inevitably his mind will be in doubt as to his rights in the premises?

This rule of law laid down by the courts themselves, if adhered to and followed by our judges, would at once remove most of the confusion that now exists. When nine Judges, all of superior ability, all learned in the law, all conscientious, listen to a learned discussion by able lawyers of a disputed constitutional question, and reach a unanimous conclusion, the point would clearly be established beyond a reasonable doubt. If, on the other hand, after such consideration, the members of the Court disagree nearly evenly upon the disputed question, it would follow, as night follows day, that a doubt would be raised, no matter which side of the question the Judge was on. A 5-to-4 decision of itself would raise a reasonable doubt, not only in the mind of every member of the Court but in the minds of all thinking people, whatever might be their following or occupation.

If the Supreme Court would apply this universal, well-established rule, it would at once reverse every 5-to-4 decision it ever made in declaring any act of Congress unconstitutional. If this reasonable and well-established rule were applied, there would be little, if any, doubt left in the minds of any of our people when the Supreme Court had acted.

It follows, therefore, that without any act of Congress, without any amendment of the Constitution, the Court itself could, and should, by its own action, purify the atmosphere as to any conflict between two of the great branches of Government. But it is perhaps too much to expect that the Court will of its own motion take this step. It is important, therefore, to consider the admitted constitutional powers of Congress—to ascertain whether such a result can be brought about by act of Congress without amending the Federal Constitution.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION OF THE SUPREME COURT

Under the Constitution the Supreme Court has both original and appellate jurisdiction. Its original jurisdiction is not important in the discussion of the problem now before us. The Constitution, after giving the Supreme Court original jurisdiction in certain cases, provides that—

In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

It would seem clear, therefore, that the Supreme Court would have no appellate jurisdiction unless Congress made some provision by which such jurisdiction could be acquired; and if Congress provides for appellate jurisdiction it can likewise provide the regulations under which the jurisdiction shall be exercised, and can also provide for any exceptions it sees fit, thus preventing the Supreme Court from having jurisdiction in any case or class of cases it desires to withhold.

Even before the Constitution was adopted, and while the question of its adoption was pending before the Colonies, Marshall made a speech in the Virginia Convention in which he stated:

Congress is empowered to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction, as to law and fact, of the Supreme Court. These exceptions certainly go as far as the legislature may think proper for the interest and liberty of the people.

In 1882 the Supreme Court cleared the question of any doubt. In Duncan v. The Francis Wright (105 U. S. 381), at pages 385 and 386, the Court said:

Actual jurisdiction under the power is confined within such limits as Congress sees fit to prescribe. * * * Authority to limit the jurisdiction necessarily carries with it authority to limit the use of the jurisdiction. Not only may whole classes of cases be kept out of the jurisdiction altogether, but particular classes of questions may be subjected to reexamination and review, while others are not. * * * The general power to regulate implies power to regulate in all things.

In this case the Supreme Court upheld an act of Congress excepting from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court the right to pass on questions of fact, although section 2, article III of the Constitution expressly provides that "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact." On this question the Supreme Court, at page 386, said:

To our minds it is no more unconstitutional to provide that issues of fact shall not be retried in any case, than that neither issues of law nor fact shall be retried in cases where the value of the matter in dispute is less than $5,000.

In 1893 the Court adhered to its previous ruling, and in American Construction Co. v. Jacksonville Railway Co. (148 U. S. 378) said:

This Court, therefore, as it has always held, can exercise no appellate jurisdiction, except in the cases, and in the manner and form, defined and prescribed by Congress.

Again, as late as 1926, in Luckenbach v. United States (272 U. S. 533) the Supreme Court said:

An appellate review is not essential to due process of law, but is matter of grace.

The famous McCardle case (7 Wall. 506), it will be remembered, had reached the Supreme Court, had been argued, and had been submitted to that tribunal when Congress passed a statute taking away from the Supreme Court its appellate jurisdiction. The Supreme Court, in passing upon that question, said:

> We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the Legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution; and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this Court is given by express words.

In Wiscart v. D'Auchy (3 Dallas, 320), at page 327, the Supreme Court, speaking of the appellate jurisdiction of that Court, said:

> If Congress has provided no rule to regulate our proceedings, we cannot exercise an appellate jurisdiction; and if the rule is provided, we cannot depart from it.

In Barry v. Mercein (5 Howard, 103), at page 119, in emphatic language the Supreme Court held that it had no appellate jurisdiction except that which is conferred by act of Congress. The Court said:

> By the Constitution of the United States, the Supreme Court possesses no appellate power in any case, unless conferred upon it by act of Congress; nor can it, when conferred be exercised in any other form, or by any other mode of proceedings than that which the law prescribes.

In Crawford v. Points (13 Howard, 11), at page 11, the Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Taney, said:

> It is very clear that the appeal cannot be sustained. The appellant endeavors to support it, upon the ground that there is no act of Congress now in force establishing a circuit court for the western district of Virginia. But, assuming this to be the case, it does not follow that an appeal to this Court can be taken from the decree of the district court. For we can exercise no appellate power, unless it is conferred by law; and there is no act of Congress authorizing an appeal to this Court from the decision of a district court in a case of bankruptcy.

In Colorado Central Mining Company v. Turck (150 U. S. 138), at page 141, the Supreme Court, speaking through Chief Justice Fuller, after referring with approval to several cases on this subject, said:

> It has been held in an uninterrupted series of decisions that this Court exercises appellate jurisdiction only in accordance with the acts of Congress upon that subject.

In National Exchange Bank v. Peters (144 U. S. 570), at page 572, the Chief Justice, speaking for the Court, said:

> Although the appellate powers of this Court are given by the Constitution, they are nevertheless limited and regulated by acts of Congress.

In this connection the Chief Justice referred to the case of Durousseau v. United States (6 Cranch 307), page 314, wherein it was held that the affirmative description of jurisdiction implied "a negative on the exercise of such appellate power as is not comprehended within it."

These constitutional provisions, as construed by our own Supreme Court, seem to give Congress complete jurisdiction over the subject matter. It can withhold all appellate jurisdiction from the Supreme Court; it can grant to the Supreme Court such jurisdiction as it sees fit, and provide by law how such jurisdiction shall be exercised; and it can withhold appellate jurisdiction from the Supreme Court to any extent it sees fit.

Would it not logically follow, therefore, that if Congress can regulate the exercise of jurisdiction by the Supreme Court, it could establish the rule that the Supreme Court itself could establish without any act, and provide that where the issue was the constitutionality of an act of Congress, even a unanimous opinion of the Court should be necessary in order to nullify an act of Congress as being unconstitutional?

If the Supreme Court itself, without any change of Constitution or law, can set up a rule that an act of Congress cannot be nullified as unconstitutional unless the judgment nullifying that act of Congress shall be concurred in by more than a bare majority of the members of the Court, would it not follow that Congress in its constitutional regulatory power could set up such a rule, and that the Court would be bound to follow it? If judges of our courts always remained within the domain of the judiciary, and did not undertake to condemn acts of Congress as unconstitutional because such laws did not harmonize with their own philosophy of government, or because they doubted the wisdom of such legislation, there would be no trouble.

I am not unmindful of the fact that Mr. Chief Justice Hughes has expressed some doubt about this particular power of Congress which I am discussing in his book The Supreme Court of the United States, at page 241, where he said:

> But making allowance for such exceptions and giving effect to such regulations as Congress may appropriately provide with respect to the cases in which the appellate jurisdiction shall be exercised, when the appellate jurisdiction attaches to a case the judicial power extends to it, and it is doubtful to say the least if Congress would have the constitutional authority to fetter the exercise of the judicial power by giving the control of it to the minority of the Court.

The Chief Justice does not express himself explicitly, and what he has said goes only so far as to raise a doubt as to whether Congress has the constitutional power thus to limit the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. I realize that even a doubt coming from such high authority is entitled to weight, and should cause us to hesitate before going contrary to the doubt thus expressed. However, it does not appear from what the Chief Justice has said that he had given this question more than superficial examination, and the doubt expressed cannot be considered as of the same weight as an opinion given in a case where the question discussed was the real issue. What the Chief Justice said certainly should have no more weight than obiter dictum in an ordinary case.

It is quite clear from the Constitution itself and from all the authorities heretofore cited that Congress has power to limit the appellate jurisdiction in any way it sees fit, and the jurisdiction extends no further than the boundaries fixed by such limitation.

It is true, as the Chief Justice says, when appellate jurisdiction attaches that judicial power extends to it; but it is fundamental, and will not be disputed, that when jurisdiction ends judicial power ends with it. Without jurisdiction it follows conclusively there can be no judicial power. I most respectfully submit that such a law would not give the control of judicial power to "the minority of the Court."

But, for argument's sake, suppose it does. If the Constitution gives this control, who can complain? If a fair interpretation of the words of the Constitution would give control of the Court to even one of its members, the Supreme Court—like every other body of men—would be powerless to extend such control beyond the language of the Constitution itself. In other words, the Supreme Court has no authority to amend the clear meaning of the Constitution by carrying judicial power beyond the jurisdiction given it by the Constitution itself or beyond the law fixed by Congress in pursuance of such constitutional authority.

But because more than a bare majority is required to render judgment it does not follow that the control of the Court is thereby turned over to a minority of its members. Examples of this are found in the Constitution itself. It is provided in the Constitution, for instance, that a judge, after being impeached by the House, shall be tried by the Senate; but the Senate can render no judgment of guilty in the case unless there is a two-thirds majority of the Senate in favor of it. Could any one with reason say this gave control of the Senate to a minority of its Members? By the same instrument the Senate is given authority to try any of its Members, and has power to expel such Members, but only by a two-thirds vote. In other words, a judgment of expulsion cannot be rendered by the Senate unless two-thirds of its Members favor it. The defendant in a criminal trial cannot be found guilty if even 1 out of the 12 members of the jury withholds his judgment. The effect of this is to preclude the jury from rendering a verdict unless it unanimously agrees. It has no jurisdiction to render such verdict, and the power to do it falls when the jurisdiction fails.

It seems perfectly clear that an able jurist with the ability and wide learning of Chief Justice Hughes would necessarily and irresistibly reach the logical conclusion, if such an issue were brought before him in his official capacity, that Congress does have the constitutional power to provide by law that no judgment of unconstitutionality could be rendered by the Supreme Court unless the judgment were concurred in by the number of justices specified in the act.

With the wisdom or unwisdom of any law the judge has nothing whatever to do. It is not within his province. An act of Congress can be repealed. Every 2 years the people elect all the Members of the House of Representatives and one-third of the Senate. Therefore it is within the power of the people themselves to bring about a comparatively swift remedy. But when the Supreme Court, perhaps by a bare majority of one, has adjudged an act of Congress to be unconstitutional there is no remedy on the part of the people except to amend the Constitution; and that, as everybody knows, is a long, laborious, tedious remedy, one that often cannot be attained until the evil has gone beyond repair. This act of the Court becomes a precedent, and if it is wrong that wrong is perpetuated and carried on through unborn generations.

The correct rule is very forcefully stated by Justice Stone in his dissenting opinion in the A. A. A. case, volume 297, United States Reports, 78–79, and although he was not speaking for the majority of the Court, yet I am satisfied the quotation I shall make from his opinion is universally admitted to be a correct statement of the law. Justice Stone in this opinion said:

> The power of the courts to declare a statute unconstitutional is subject to two guiding principles of decision which ought never to be absent from judicial consciousness. One is that courts are concerned only with the power to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. The other is that while unconstitutional exercise of power by the executive and legislative branches of the Government is subject to judicial restraint, the only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government.

We must not forget that any tribunal, whether judicial or legislative, is composed of men with all the imperfections attributable to humanity. No organization, either of judges or of legislators, is perfect; and the human element must in the end enter largely into the decision, whether made by a court or made by a legislature.

It would seem, therefore, not only reasonable but imperative that when the Supreme Court is passing upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress it should not be permitted to nullify such act of Congress by a bare majority of one. It does not seem logical, it does not seem fair, that a law passed by the Congress, composed of more than 500 men, the representatives of the people, and approved by the President, elected by all the people, should be set aside by a bare majority of one, in a court holding unlimited power for life and not responsible in any way, directly or indirectly, to the people of the country.

INFERIOR COURTS

The greatest evils in our judicial system come from the inferior courts. In the United States there are over 150 Federal district judges. Under our present system every one of these judges has power to issue injunctions restraining the enforcement of Federal statutes. That the power to issue these injunctions has been abused is common knowledge. The wrong and the damage that have occurred from such injunctions issued by these courts from one end of the country to the other, in nullifying acts of Congress as unconstitutional, have amounted to many millions of dollars. Injunctions wrongfully issued, even though later denied and set aside by the appellate court, have nevertheless caused untold and irreparable damage, and have often interfered with the liberties and the rights of the people to an extent that would require the imagination fully to comprehend.

The report of the Federal Power Commission, made in response to a resolution of the Senate, gives some wonderful disclosures in the way of government by injunction. This report is confined entirely to injunctions relating to public electrical projects. It must be remembered, too, that this report ends with the year 1935. There should be many cases added, because 1936 is prolific with injunction suits commenced by private utilities against the installation of publicly owned electric-light projects. Since 1931 and up to December 31, 1935, there were 186 restraining orders and injunctions applied for in such cases. The delay incurred from litigation in 246 cases amounted in the aggregate to 289 years 8 months and 22 days, an average of 1 year 2 months and 4 days per case. The great bulk of these cases occurred in comparatively recent years.

Direct expenses incurred in such cases amounted to $376,233 for 198 cases, an average per case of more than $1,900. These figures do not include direct expenses estimated at $1,000,000 by the city of Los Angeles. Indirect expenses, consisting of extra charges, losses in profits, and losses to consumers, extra charges to the authorities for electrical energy for such use, totaled $11,920,207 in 162 cases, or an average of $73,582 per case.

The majority of such orders have been sought during the past 5 years—90 prior to 1931; 186 since that date up to December 31, 1935. Between January 1, 1931, and December 31, 1935, 127 cases were instituted against public authorities not involved in P. W. A. or T. V. A. proposals or activities, 50 cases involving P. W. A. loans or grants, and 9 cases against the 19 public authorities concerned in the Tennessee Valley Authority's proposals. (Full and complete detailed information as to these injunction suits can be obtained by an examination of Senate Document 182 of the Seventy-fourth Congress, second session.)

In the various improvements and projects undertaken by the Public Works Administration, it has been found to be invariably true that wherever such a project is for the purpose of assisting a municipality in installing an electric-lighting plant, the project has been met and delayed at its very inception by a private power company applying to some court for an injunction restraining the construction of the project in question. The Administrator of Public Works reports:

> The number of suits against power projects and the similarity of their wording indicate a concerted move on the part of power companies of the country to prevent any city from carrying out its desires in this direction.
> The chief purpose of these suits is to obtain a preliminary injunction; and, once injunctions are obtained, the power companies employ devious dilatory practices to prevent a final adjudication of the issues by the Supreme Court, evidently feeling that an indefinite delay is preferable to a final determination of the real issue. In some cases this delay has been so long drawn out as to discourage the applicant and cause the project to be dropped, thus completely defeating the city's efforts.

This matter was passed on by the circuit court of appeals for the fourth circuit in the case of Duke Power Co. v. Greenwood County (81 F. (2d) 986, at p. 994). In this case the circuit court said:

> If it be conceded, as we think it must be, that the expenditure of public funds for the relief of Nation-wide unemployment is within the power of Congress, as being an expenditure in furtherance of the general welfare of the United States, we think that it necessarily follows that expenditures for a Nation-wide program of public works for the purpose of providing employment in such an emergency is within the congressional power.

This case was taken on appeal by the power company to the Supreme Court of the United States. Although the case was fully argued and both sides expected an opinion of the Court upon the merits, the Supreme Court in its opinion made no reference to the issues relied on by both sides. It reversed the circuit court of appeals on points that were not referred to in the hearing. It ignored all the issues that were raised by everybody and decided the case upon an issue not raised by anybody. The Secretary of the Interior reports there were more than 50 cases in inferior courts awaiting the decision on the issues raised in the Supreme Court in this case.

The delay and damage resulting from the delay in injunction cases is clearly illustrated by the injunction issued by Judge Grubb in Alabama against the T. V. A. in what is ordinarily known as the Ashwander case. That injunction held up the T. V. A., which in effect was the Government of the United States, for more than a year, preventing to a great extent the use of energy generated at Wilson Dam.

Not only did that erroneous decision of a single judge result in waste and financial loss to the Government and to persons with whom the Government had contracts, but there is no way whereby the Government or its contractors can recover the damages sustained. This case illustrates also the damages that can and do occur continually through preliminary injunctions which are afterward set aside by the Supreme Court.

The T. V. A. at Wilson Dam was making electricity. Fourteen municipalities wanted to buy this electricity. The injunction prevented the consummation of a contract by which the electricity could be sold by the T. V. A. and purchased by the municipalities. The electricity could not be stored, and, since the injunction prevented its use, the result was almost a total loss.

In the meantime the private power company was supplying the municipalities with electricity at enormous prices. So that the T. V. A. lost the sale of this electricity and the municipalities lost the difference between what they would have paid the T. V. A. and what they had to pay the private power companies, which were in reality behind the injunction. Although the T. V. A. won the case in the Supreme Court, it lost a vast amount of money; and although the private power companies lost the suit, they made all the money which the T. V. A. and the municipalities lost. The losses in this case to the T. V. A., in actual expenses and in the loss of revenue from the sale of power, amounted in the aggregate to nearly a million dollars. Indirect losses to the consumers of electricity in the municipalities amounted to between one million and two million dollars. This illustrates how injunctions wrongfully issued by inferior courts result in almost untold damages, even though the case is finally won in the Supreme Court.

This point is further illustrated by an injunction recently issued by Judge Gore in the Federal court in Tennessee.

In this case the Georgia Power Co. commenced an action in Georgia, in which it asked for a preliminary injunction against the T. V. A. The case came on for hearing upon the application for a preliminary injunction. After the evidence was in, and after the case was fully argued by both sides, Judge Sibley of the circuit court, presiding in the district court, denied the application for a preliminary injunction.

The very next day, while this case was still pending in the Federal court in Georgia, the Georgia Power Co., with 18 other plaintiffs, went into the Federal District Court of Northern Alabama, filed a petition therein, praying for the same relief that the Georgia Power Co. had asked in the Georgia Federal district court. After the case had been set for hearing upon the application for a preliminary injunction, and when the parties were all ready to proceed, the day before such hearing was to be had, the power companies dismissed the case. Then these same plaintiffs, 19 in number, went into Tennessee, where in the Federal district court they prayed for the same relief that had been asked for in the other two cases, and there—in Tennessee—they found a judge who was willing to grant their application for a temporary injunction. The power companies went through Georgia, Alabama, and finally into Tennessee, hunting a judge who was willing to grant their prayer.

This preliminary injunction ties the hands of T. V. A., and, with some exceptions, prohibits the T. V. A. from building transmission lines or from negotiating contracts with municipalities or from carrying out contracts already negotiated. The damages in this case, which is still pending, even though in the end it is won by T. V. A., will result in millions of dollars to the T. V. A. and to the consumers of electricity, who would get the benefit of reduced electrical rates were it not for the issuance of this injunction.

But greater than any money damages, and beyond the power of the human mind fully to comprehend, is the injury to the morale, the organization, the employees, the municipalities that are interested, and the thousands of consumers of electricity who must suffer, innocent though they are, on account of these injunctions issued by lower inferior courts. The discouragements that come to the citizens of municipalities, after they have decided by huge majorities in public elections to buy power of the T. V. A., are beyond the power of language to describe. The city of Chattanooga, 2 years ago, at a general election, voted by a majority of about 3 to 1 to buy power from the T. V. A., and yet its hands are tied because the hands of the T. V. A. are tied, and the citizens are becoming discouraged because the Federal Government itself has been made impotent and helpless by injunctions issued at the behest of the private power companies.

A PROPER BOND SHOULD BE REQUIRED

Much could be done to relieve the evil of the situation, if Congress should provide by law that before any preliminary restraining order or injunction issued, the party applying for the order should be required to give a proper bond. This bond should remain in full force and effect until the case is finally determined. Under the present law, if a district court makes the preliminary injunction permanent, the plaintiff is relieved from the payment of damages, even though the case remain undisposed of for a year or more, and even though ultimately it is determined that the injunction never should have been issued.

It is clearly within the power of Congress to provide that the plaintiff shall, by proper bond, protect the defendant from damages that may occur during the time the case is winding its weary way to the Court of last resort.

MUNICIPALITY SHOULD BE MADE PARTY DEFENDANT

Congress should also provide by law that any municipality having an interest in the results of such litigation should, on application, be made a party to the suit, and that such municipality and its citizens should have the right to bring an action on such bond if in the final determination of the case the court found that the injunction had been wrongfully issued.

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT SHOULD BE MADE PARTY WHEREVER AN ACT OF CONGRESS IS INVOLVED

Another very important safeguard could be provided by act of Congress, and that is that wherever the issue of the constitutionality of any statute is raised the United States should be made a party to the suit and given an opportunity to be heard.

INCREASING THE MEMBERSHIP OF THE SUPREME COURT

Our Constitution does not fix the number of Justices that shall constitute the Supreme Court. The membership of this Court has been changed several times by act of Congress. There is no shadow of doubt but what Congress has the constitutional authority to increase the number of Supreme Court Justices to any number it sees fit. Whether such a remedy should be pursued and such a law passed—and while there may be serious question as to the wisdom of such a course—the power of Congress in the premises cannot be doubted.

From the foregoing, and from the undisputed power of Congress, it is fair, I think, to conclude that Congress, without any amendment to the Constitution, has authority—

1. To take away from inferior courts the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. If Congress exercised this authority, it would naturally follow that the Supreme Court would likewise be deprived of authority to declare such acts unconstitutional, because the authority to do so depends upon its appellate jurisdiction, and there would be no way for such a case to reach the Supreme Court.

2. To limit in any way it saw fit the power of the lower court in acting upon constitutional questions. It could take away all jurisdiction of the present inferior courts and set up a new court having exclusive and original jurisdiction of constitutional questions.

3. To provide that the judgment of this new court should be exclusive and final, or to provide a method by which constitutional questions could be taken on appeal from such court to the Supreme Court.

4. To require that in all cases, in whatever court the question might be raised, the Government should be made a party to the suit and given an opportunity to be heard.

5. To regulate and make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, and to provide by law that no act of Congress should be held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court unless such judgment should be concurred in by a number of Justices specified in the act.

6. To regulate and make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in any way it saw fit.

7. To provide that no injunction or temporary restraining order shall be issued setting aside an act of Congress as unconstitutional, except upon the giving of an adequate bond to protect all parties interested from damage, and to provide that such bond shall continue in force and effect until the case is finally adjudicated in the appellate court.

8. To provide by statute for the increase of the number of justices, either of the Supreme Court or of any inferior court.

CONSTITUTIONAL REMEDIES

Our Constitution was framed by wise and able men. But these forefathers could not possibly have looked into the future and seen the wonderful advancement that was going to be made in all lines of human endeavor. They could not see that our natural resources, in the century that was to follow, could be jeopardized and ultimately destroyed unless the fundamental law was construed by the courts to be a living instrument, keeping pace with the advancement of civilization. When our Constitution was written, the railroad, the telephone, the telegraph, the radio, and electricity were unknown. The public highways as they now exist were not dreamed of. No one then knew that the trails winding across the mountains would eventually become paved highways for interstate traffic.

Our Constitution ought to be construed in the light of the present-day civilization instead of being put in a straitjacket made more than a century ago.

Our judiciary has not kept pace with human progress. Our judges too often have stood upon the highways of human progress and held aloft "stop" signs that have impeded civilization in its triumphant march. Our forefathers were not laboring under the impression that they were living in an age that had reached the end of human progress. And, with due respect to the ability, the honesty, and the wisdom of our judges, I believe it can truthfully be said that many of them are living in an age that is past and are continuing to construe our fundamental law in a light that has failed rather than in the sunlight of an electric age.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION

In connection with this subject, several very important suggestions have been made relating to our judiciary which would require amendments to the Constitution.

A DEFINITE TERM OF OFFICE FOR JUDGES

One amendment of this kind, which seems to me to be very desirable, is that members of both the Supreme Court and the inferior courts should be appointed for specific terms rather than for life. Our present system, provided for under our Constitution, is a very beautiful theory. To give to the judges a tenure of office that lasts for life, to pay them a competent salary, to place them beyond and above the power of the people to interfere with their authority, and to give to the Supreme Court Justices absolute, unlimited, and final authority is supposed to place the bench upon a pedestal of security and independence where the judges cannot possibly be influenced in any degree whatever.

The trouble with this theory is that it does not work in practice. Judges, after all, are only men. The elevation of a man to the bench, even though it be for life, does not give him any attributes of divinity. He still has all the imperfections of humanity. He still retains his prejudices, his viewpoint, his likes, and his dislikes. In other words, he has all the virtues and all the infirmities he possessed before he went on the bench. The luxury of his new surroundings naturally has a tendency to cause him to forget the trials and tribulations and the hardships that beset the ordinary, common individual. There is no perfect man, and therefore there can be no perfect court.

If a judge, endowed with unlimited and absolute power, with a tenure of office for life, and without there being any appeal from his decision, makes a mistake, however honestly and conscientiously it may have been made, he thereby sets up a permanent law the burdens and wrongs of which must be borne by generations yet unborn.

Such machinery in our Government is a relic of the absolute monarchy that prevailed before the dawn of civilization. Such a doctrine is abhorrent in a democracy. There is no man, however great, however honest, however conscientious, however wise, who ought to be entrusted for life with absolute authority where there is no appeal from his decision. It is true our Constitution can be amended, but such method is long, uncertain, and requires the almost unanimous consent of the entire country. There is no practical remedy to correct the mistakes of the Supreme Court. If by amendment we should take away the life tenure of office, we would do no injury to anyone, and we would take away from our judiciary this relic of the absolute monarchy and restore the beneficent virtues of democracy.

GIVING CONGRESS POWER TO OVERRIDE A VETO OF THE SUPREME COURT

Another very important amendment to the Constitution has been given serious consideration ever since the framing of our Constitution. In fact, it was suggested in various forms by eminent members of the Constitutional Convention. This suggestion is to provide by constitutional amendment that whenever the Supreme Court has set aside an act of Congress as being unconstitutional the question shall be submitted again to Congress. If, upon such resubmission, Congress again passes the act in dispute, it shall become the law, notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court.

In other words, such a proposition would treat the decision of the Supreme Court much as a veto of the President is now treated; and if the National Legislature should again pass the law over the judicial veto, it would become the law of the land.

LABOR

Some law national in its scope regulating the hours and conditions of labor is a positive necessity. Congress, representing the Nation, is the only power that can deal effectively with this question. Under the decisions of our Supreme Court, it is very doubtful whether Congress has the constitutional authority to pass a law on this subject which would be effective in bringing about a remedy from the present intolerable situation. An amendment to the Constitution giving this power to Congress is a practical necessity. We have been trying to deal with the unemployment situation from the very beginning of the depression. We have not yet provided a permanent remedy, and, in my humble judgment, we never shall settle this question permanently until we have a national law which will limit the hours as well as the conditions of human labor.

AGRICULTURE

Agriculture is perhaps the greatest of all our industries. A prosperous agriculture is absolutely necessary to the happiness of our people and the prosperity of our Nation. When agriculture languishes, prosperity disappears. Those who produce the food we eat must have not only the cost of production but a reasonable profit as well. All our people, whatever may be their calling in life, depend for their happiness and their prosperity upon a successful agriculture.

Congress has tried in vain to give relief on this subject. The Supreme Court has nullified all such attempts. If the decisions of the Court remain, it is absolutely imperative that Congress be given authority by an amendment to the Constitution to meet this situation. Notwithstanding the decisions of the Supreme Court, we all know that agriculture is the broadest and perhaps the most fundamental of all our industries. It is not local; it is national in its scope, any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding.

CONSTITUTIONAL AND LEGISLATIVE REMEDIES PURSUED AT THE SAME TIME

I see no reason why Congress should not pursue its legislative remedies and the remedy by way of constitutional amendment at the same time. There is no apparent reason why such a course should not be followed. Congress has not exhausted all of its constitutional authority. It is perfectly reasonable that it should do this, and at the same time propose to the legislatures of the States any amendment to the Constitution that may seem desirable.

In conclusion I should like to say to those who are opposed to any amendment of the Constitution and who are likewise opposed to any act of Congress limiting in any way the jurisdiction of our courts, that the course they are pursuing, if persisted in and if successful, will result in the pendulum swinging further to the other side than progressive, thinking men and women are advocating at this time. We are asking only that the powers given to Congress by the Constitution should be exercised; and in amendments to the Constitution that are proposed we are striving only to make the Constitution more democratic, to give to our people "domestic tranquillity", "the blessings of liberty", and more fully to "promote the general welfare." The present intolerable situation cannot go on indefinitely; and, unless some reasonable degree of control is brought about, those who seek to prevent any innovation will find themselves in the end in a situation where all authority of any court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional will be taken away.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in the course of the very illuminating speech of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] I thought I heard reference made to the attitude of Chief Justice Hughes. While I concede that what I am about to refer to has no final bearing on the subject, I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Nebraska to the book entitled "The Supreme Court of the United States", comprising a series of lectures delivered by the Chief Justice during the time when he was not upon the bench.

In connection with the suggestion which has been made that Congress might pass legislation to provide certain rules governing the decisions of the Court on questions involving the constitutionality of statutes, I desire to call the Senator's attention to the following statement in the volume to which I have referred, The Supreme Court of the United States:

> It is urged that as legislation should be held to be repugnant to the Constitution only in clear cases, and as this is recognized as a principle of decision, a division in the Court should be regarded as enough to show reasonable doubt. Plainly, that suggestion cannot be carried to its logical limit. If it were, the action of a single judge in the court of first instance holding an act to be constitutional would be conclusive, for is he not a reasonable man? Or, if that judge decided the act to be unconstitutional, and in the circuit court of appeals two judges agreed with him, but the third dissented, should not the majority bow to his dissent as sufficiently indicating doubt? We have similar considerations with respect to State court decisions. Why have any review by the Supreme Court in such cases, unless the courts under review, whether Federal or State, should hold legislation to be unconstitutional?
> And then on the view suggested their unanimous opinions to this effect might be overthrown and the legislation still be sustained if a minority of the Supreme Court considered it to be valid, as a vote of the majority of the Supreme Court would not be sufficient to render a contrary decision.
> In truth, judges will have their convictions, and it is of the essence of the appropriate exercise of judicial power that these should be independently expressed. Divisions on close questions cannot be prevented.

Then on page 41 the Chief Justice says:

> But making allowance for such exceptions and giving effect to such regulations as Congress may appropriately provide with respect to the cases in which the appellate jurisdiction shall be exercised, when the appellate jurisdiction attaches to a case the judicial power extends to it, and its is doubtful, to say the least, if Congress would have the constitutional authority to fetter the exercise of the judicial power by giving the control of it to the minority of the Court.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. LEWIS and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have risen to address myself to a matter different from that which has been advanced by the able Senator from Nebraska. I prefer to yield to Senators who expect to speak on that particular subject. At this particular time I yield to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I merely desire to submit a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question or two of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] before he leaves the floor. In beginning his remarks he announced that he did not desire to be interrupted while he was speaking, but that he would respond to questions at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will permit me, it will be necessary for me to leave the floor at 2 o'clock, and I should like to submit a report from the Committee on the Judiciary. It will take only a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Permit the Chair to get the parliamentary situation clear. Does the Senator from Illinois yield the floor?

Mr. LEWIS. I do not yield the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator to submit a report; then I will yield to the Senator from Arkansas, who desires to address himself to the question discussed by the senior Senator from Nebraska, and I shall also yield to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who desires to discuss the same subject. I do not wish, however, to intrude the subject matter in which I am interested into the discussion of the other subject.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT IN MISSOURI

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, as in executive session I desire to submit a report on a nomination from the Committee on the Judiciary, and since it is necessary that I ask unanimous consent for immediate consideration, I wish to make a statement in reference to the report.

The Attorney General of the United States in his annual report in 1934, and again in 1935, stated that the congestion in the United States district court in Missouri made necessary the appointment of an additional judge. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate last year gave full consideration to the matter and reported a bill providing for an additional judgeship, which passed both Houses of the Congress and was signed by the President on June 22, 1936.

On Tuesday of this week the President nominated John Caskie Collet, at present a judge on the Supreme Court of Missouri, to fill this vacancy. I happened to be named as chairman of the subcommittee to which the nomination was referred. The subcommittee has considered the qualifications of Mr. Collet and found them to be excellent, and the full committee has authorized me to report the nomination. Because of the congestion in the district in question, I ask unanimous consent that action may now be taken on the nomination.

Mr. ROBINSON. No, Mr. President; unanimous consent cannot be given. Daily we have executive sessions when such matters are, in regular order, brought before the Senate.

Mr. BURKE. Very well. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may submit the report of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall not make any objection to the submission of the report as in executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be received, and the nomination will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I again say that as the subject matter about which I rose to speak is not the one discussed by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] desire to address themselves to that theme, I prefer for the moment to yield the floor in order that the remarks of Senators may run concurrently.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I do not desire to address the Senate at any great length at the present time, but in view of the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has called attention to a very great authority on the subject of the Supreme Court, I wish to call attention to another authority, who agrees with me, and, I think, did agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] a few years ago. I am sure he would be recognized as a far greater authority than anybody else with reference to the needs of the Court and the method by which we should arrive at the results which it is desired to accomplish.

At the outset I desire to say that I am not at all in disagreement with the Senator from Nebraska with reference to the objectives which he seeks; I am in thorough accord with those objectives. Likewise, I think the authority from which I shall quote is in accord with those objectives.

In the book I hold in my hand it is stated, on page 193—

> It is unnecessary to take time in establishing the fact that the administration of justice is generally unpopular with the people of this country. Growing complaint with the laws' injustices, delays, and cost has to a great extent characterized every generation. The present one is no exception, but at the present time the problem rises into significance beyond the mere stage of dissatisfaction. It becomes a public problem of great importance.
> Speedy and efficient justice is no more necessary to the individual in such vast communities as New York or Chicago than it is in the smaller places, but in the large communities it should be placed as soon as possible on a par of importance with health, sanitation, and police protection if we are to give adequate government to the great masses of our citizens.
> It is a matter of common knowledge that justice has not been adequately provided. Moreover, in a time of economic distress such as this the multiplication of legal actions involving debts increases. The necessity for relief is accentuated.

I do not agree with the following statement, but the author says:

> The jury trial, for example, established in order to provide the means for trustworthy decisions on matters of fact is used all too frequently for purposes of delay.
> The only way to attack the problem is by rigorous application of judicial efficiency. In the face of this congestion the remedy commonly proposed is to add new judges or new courts, but it will readily be seen that if the problem is what I have stated it to be, such a so-called remedy merely aggravates the complaint. There are, of course, legitimate demands for additional judicial manpower in sections where the population has grown rapidly. But it is easy to see that to apply this remedy in all cases is to add to the ravages of the disease, to contribute to the confusion, and what is profoundly important at this time, to burden still further an already seriously embarrassed taxpayer. With taxes mounting in all the subdivisions of government, the time has come for a veritable searching of heart with regard to the cost of public service, and new demands should be most carefully scrutinized in the light of this problem of dollars and cents.

> One of the difficulties of the past has been that attempts at reform have concerned themselves largely with the highest courts. These courts, as the result of consistent efforts on the part of reformers and largely because of the generally splendid personnel of judges who have served in them, have been a credit to the Nation. It is nevertheless true that our inferior courts have been and are vastly in need of reconstructive improvement. * * *
> In the quest of reform there is no question as to the willingness of leaders of the bar to assist not only individually as lawyers but through the various legal associations—

And so forth.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that I am not quoting from the writing of some man who is a candidate for office. I am quoting from a book entitled "Looking Forward", written in 1933 by the present President of the United States of America.

I merely desire to say that, because some of us disagree with the method the President now proposes and agree with what he said in 1933 as to the practical way to reach and solve the problem, it seems that we are considered to be just "defeatist lawyers", or something of that kind. I maintain that the President of the United States, in writing that book, was correct when he said that the unsound way of going about this matter was to increase the membership of the Court, because, as he said, it would only add to the ravages of the disease.

The same thing, in effect, was said by Prof. Felix Frankfurter in the book he wrote just a few years ago in conjunction with the head of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

I desire to correct the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] with reference to one statement he made, and I think he will agree to the correction. He said, as I understood him, that the courts had prevented all legislation with reference to farm relief.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the McNary-Haugen bill, which both he and I most vigorously supported, and which I still think provided a better way of meeting the situation than the A. A. A., was not nullified by the Supreme Court. It was vetoed by the then President of the United States of America.

Mr. NORRIS. A good many other bills were vetoed by the President. Of course, the McNary-Haugen bill was not nullified by the Supreme Court. It never got a chance to deal with it.

Mr. WHEELER. No. I know that some very able lawyers argued in this body that that measure was unconstitutional.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. I do not know how the Senator can offer that as a defense of the Supreme Court, however, for the Supreme Court never had a chance to pass upon that measure. It is not entitled to credit because it did not go wrong there.

Mr. WHEELER. No; I did not offer that as a defense; but I am sure the Senator did not intend to make the statement he made when he said that the Supreme Court had prevented all chance of passage of that measure. If I misunderstood the Senator about that, I should like to be set right.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator probably has a right to be more or less technical about the matter. Of course, I did not mean the Supreme Court had passed on the measure. A great many bills have been passed which have never gone to the Supreme Court and the Court has had no chance to pass on them. I think it would be fair to say that I referred principally to the A. A. A. decision. The Agricultural Adjustment Act was the important agricultural measure which was passed upon by the Supreme Court.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not defending the Supreme Court. I have said repeatedly that the Supreme Court of the United States has been wrong when it has passed upon economic and political problems, and I now reiterate it. I also say, however, that adding six more Justices to the Supreme Court for life will not correct the situation, and there is no assurance that it ever will be corrected by such a method.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I expect to discuss that question in time if it comes before the Senate. I wish to say now that, although I mentioned that as a constitutional method which Congress could pursue, I did not undertake to discuss it, and there were several other things I did not discuss.

Mr. WHEELER. I fully appreciate that. I was simply calling attention to my own views, and not to the Senator's views upon that particular phase of the question. I rose at this time merely to call attention to the fact that on a former occasion the President of the United States, at a time when he was President, denounced the idea of adding additional judges to the Supreme Court for the purpose of correcting all the evils which he says exist, and which I agree do exist to a large extent with reference to our judicial system.

RESTRICTION OF JUDICIAL POWER TO HOLD LAWS UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I have been very much impressed by the statement of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I think I quite agree with everything he has said. Whether by way of legislation or by way of constitutional amendment, it has seemed to me to be eminently desirable that there should be taken away from the Supreme Court the power by a mere majority to declare unconstitutional acts of Congress.

Yesterday I had the privilege of introducing in this body a joint resolution providing for an amendment to the Constitution, the gist of which is in this language:

> No law of the United States or of any State shall be held to be unconstitutional by any inferior court, and not by the Supreme Court unless two-thirds of the members thereof shall specifically and by separate opinion find it so beyond a reasonable doubt.

There is nothing new about that proposal. In essence, it is the same proposal as that which is defended by the Senator from Nebraska. It was laid down as long ago as 1923 by William Jennings Bryan in an article in a magazine, which, as I recall, was Hearst's International. In that article Mr. Bryan said:

Big business must not be surprised if struggling humanity still survives and hopes for the time when judges with a different bias will succeed these.

He was writing these words immediately after the Supreme Court had rendered the decision invalidating the minimum-wage law applying to the District of Columbia. He proceeded:

So many of these 5-to-4 decisions have appeared at opportune times to emasculate laws intended for the protection of weaker members of society that this new decision has given impetus to the movement to require a two-thirds or three-fourths vote in the Supreme Court to nullify a law passed by Congress or a State legislature.

Since that statement was written by Mr. Bryan, the disposition of the Supreme Court to invalidate acts of Congress has become increasingly apparent. I do not at this time desire to enter upon the merits of the question; but I should like the RECORD to show, as bearing upon the feasibility of adopting a constitutional amendment, that 41 legislatures are now in session. Of these, 22 are controlled substantially by the Democratic Party.

In Arizona, Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, Missouri, Nevada, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Washington, and West Virginia the legislatures are Democratic in both branches, and in each of these States there is a Democratic Governor.

In Montana there is a Democratic Governor, a house which is controlled by the Democratic Party and a senate in which the votes of the two parties are equal.

In Delaware, Kansas, and Massachusetts there are Democratic Governors and Republican houses and senate.

In Connecticut and New York there are Democratic Governors and Democratic senates, but Republican houses.

In Maine, New Hampshire, South Dakota, and Vermont there are Republican Governors and Republican legislatures in both branches.

In Maryland and New Jersey there are Republican Governors and Democratic legislatures in both branches.

In California there is a Republican Governor, with a Republican senate and a Democratic house of representatives.

In Iowa there is a Democratic Governor, with a Republican senate and a house divided equally between Democrats and Republicans.

In Rhode Island there is a Democratic Governor, with a Republican senate and a Democratic general assembly.

In Minnesota there is a Farmer-Labor Governor, with a conservative senate and a liberal house of representatives.

In Nebraska there is a Democratic Governor, with a unicameral nonpartisan legislature.

In North Dakota there is an Independent Governor, with a legislature in which there are three parties, with no party exercising any control.

In Wisconsin there is a Progressive Governor, and the same situation with respect to the legislature prevails as that which exists in the State of North Dakota.

Summarizing, there are 31 Democratic Governors, 7 Republican Governors, 1 Independent, 1 Farmer-Labor, and 1 Progressive.

There are 22 Democratic legislatures, 7 Republican legislatures, 6 divided, and 6 indeterminate.

I have here, Mr. President, a list of all the State legislatures in session in 1937, showing the dates upon which the sessions begin, the limits of the sessions, the dates upon which they end, and when the legislatures convene. I ask that this statement be printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

RELINQUISHMENT BY UNITED STATES OF PHILIPPINE CONTROL

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire to address the Senate on a subject not before the body.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Texas wish to interrupt me?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will yield to me for just a moment, I should like to say a word.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, Senate Joint Resolution No. 73 has been pending for some time. It relates to the Mellon gift to establish a National Gallery of Art. It was the desire of the majority leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], as expressed to me, that I make a motion to take up the joint resolution for consideration immediately following the address of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. I do not, however, wish to interfere with the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Would it interfere with the plan of the Senator from Texas if I should occupy 15 minutes before he makes the motion?

Mr. CONNALLY. No. I withdraw the request for the moment, so that the Senator from Illinois may proceed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am being called from the city tomorrow on official business at Chicago, and thus it is that I am imposing myself on the Senate at this moment. I rise to strike what I feel is a note of alarm, and to utter my own protest against a matter with which the public press and general information acquaint me. It is the suggestion that the law now upon the statute books defining the policy and providing for the independence of the Philippine Islands in 1946 is to be changed, and immediate possession given the Philippine people of their islands and all the power and authority of the United States to be at once divorced and ended.

If this is to be done, if there be truth in this report, I feel that such would be a great error. Indeed, I charge that it would be a national blunder if this country should now accord absolute independence to the Philippine Islands and thus separate from ourselves the complete control of the islands at the critical time that is now confronting our Nation.

I invite you, sirs, to consider the information which has come to us. This is that Germany has just closed with Japan an alliance that gives to Germany and Japan the joint control of the Japanese and German Navies. This gives to Germany a joint association with Japan in matters such as Japan may have in contemplation, whether respecting this, our United States, or any other country.

Sir, in this connection we are also aware that France and Russia have entered into a compact, both commercial and military, by which France is possessed of advantages which Russia may afford, military particularly, in matters that may transpire in the east around the waters or near the shores of Japan or Russia, and near the possessions of the United States.

I call attention, sir, to a compact between Italy and Austria and Italy and Germany. These, too, sir, have for their avowed purpose aiding the control of authority on the part of Japan and her allies, whether for Germany or for whomsoever it is designed. This would give complete voice to these described lands in all authority touching the Pacific coast, and particularly the combined privilege and power of the newly constituted and now greatly multiplying navies of the world.

I invite the attention of this honorable body to the announcement this morning that England has added to the building of her navy an increase far surpassing that which will be added to the navy of any other country of the world, and that in such increase she finds it agreeable to establish a pleasing situation, if not a direct compact, with Japan, and partially with France. Let us recall that England had with Japan a similar joint treaty some time past, and that here at the city of Washington, in the year 1922, it was assumed the particular treaty was withdrawn. Now we observe that the relationship which England bore thus to Japan has been renewed, and for reasons, let us feel, which England considers justify such action. Now, however, the fact is before us that all these relations are addressed clearly to the viewpoint of allowing one country in the great Orient to have such relations in Europe as will give it complete domination in any matter that may touch the United States of America.

Mr. President, I trust I may not be regarded as lacking considerations of common politeness when I say that our country seems blind to the fact that all these manipulations around us are predicated upon the theory of war that is approaching, and that, in that approach, the very first move will be by some form of alliance to barricade the United States from any effort it may make, sir, in aid of any cause or in the protection of itself, if such protection should, in the nature of things, lead to contest against any of these lands or their joint allies.

Mr. President, at a time like this we know that these conditions, as we have now seen them conceded, leave this our America alone, completely by itself; and by itself for the present time it so must remain.

America will not enter into alliances with England, despite the attitude of eminent statesmen of England, who, as we gather from the press, feel, as stated, that their secure safety in whatever may be their prospect of peril lies in some alliance with this, the United States of America. We will not join with any country in Asia, nor any other land in Europe other than England, in the matter of any political alliance. We will not risk our children to the conflicts of war, where they may be summoned by the tocsin of other lands to conflict and death. We will, however, look about to see what steps may be properly taken in a precautionary move for the complete protection of this our United States.

Particularly, sir, I refer to the guardianship by the United States of the Philippine Islands. If it be true that because of the conflicts which are now being considered and anticipated by these foreign lands they assume to make these new arrangements, these alliances which join navies together and place in some form of aggregation the joint armies of these different countries, sir, we must look at the situation. They can have but one object, and that object must be either looking toward some conflict to which they will address themselves in an assault or to some opposition to an assault. Thus the moves are being made in the defense, or preparing for offense. In such scenes, where do we act. What precaution are we taking? And in all, where will stand the United States?

In the Orient, sir, we have our interests. The Orient, if it finds occasion to resent any action on our part in the event there should be such conflicts, would move promptly upon us. In what way are we seeking to protect ourselves? Are we going to give up control of the Philippine Islands now and leave the United States without a base of supplies or a place where our Navy may be quartered and guarded, and our Pacific coast, in some degree, sir, assured of its protection? Have we reached that point where, through a form of altruism which is asserted as "generosity", we, to serve the dreams of separation and hopes of control by those whom we have served so greatly as we have those of the Philippine Islands, shall for the zeal of separate administration surrender the right of the defense of the United States? Shall we be indifferent to what is necessary to guard our welfare in the hour that is now threatened upon us by the whole world?

Mr. President, if we shall now, as is intimated, in order to accommodate the emissary of the Philippine Islands, who is now in our midst, or to serve the purpose of those who fancy they will be benefited in some form of trade, relinquish our control of the Philippine Islands and turn those islands to themselves, the very first move that Japan would naturally make, from a military point of view, in any form of conflict, would be to seize the islands, and, seizing the islands for her defense, if in conflict against her were other countries, sir, whatever the object of conflict, Japan would not allow the Philippine Islands to escape her possession in the natural course of strengthening herself. Then, sir, her next move would be to move on Hawaii, so near by, then to possess it, and this after we easily had given up any barricade between Japan and Hawaii that could be base of obstruction to any advance on America. From Hawaii, sirs, the step easily is afforded to the Pacific coast. To avoid the danger to the Pacific coast under the assault, a form of concession and reprisal would be at once naturally asked by the victors of the United States. That concession would be that we yield up our opposition under our present immigration laws and repeal our exclusion laws, then the demand that Asiatics be placed on an equality of citizenship in the United States with citizens of the United States and with American citizens anywhere in the world.

Mr. President, as to that measure of embarrassment we may say we will meet it when it arises and treat with it when it is upon us. But now we can readily see that our first duty is to avoid bringing it upon us. Our second and principal duty is to prepare our Nation as against these obstructions and possible dangers, so that it may take such steps as will guard America.

Mr. President, at this particular time, with these situations prevailing, particularly in the Orient, and in view of these compacts throughout Europe, and these clear moves having for their object something that relates to the Pacific Ocean, I oppose my country's taking a position which would result in having no base in the Pacific wherein we might protect ourselves. We now have a barrier in the Philippines between us and those who might assail us intentionally, or those who in conflict would find themselves driven by a matter of alliance to assail us to serve objects of war.

I rise to express my belief that my countrymen are spending too much time in nonessentials all around us and giving too little attention to the most important things that are necessary to the defense of our country. I refer to our surrounding possessions of America. I protest against the yielding up of our control of the Philippine Islands, and depriving ourselves of a naval base for supplies there, at this particular time. I am anxious that we realize that these movements now being undertaken in the name of "friendship" and "generosity" carry with them a threat to our welfare so serious and so solemn that they are weakening American control, and confronting us with multiplied dangers.

I rise to protest against what appears to be the threat. I oppose the policy. It is my purpose to carry this matter further when the naval supply bill shall be presented to this honorable body. In the meantime I give notice of my opposition to any move now afoot to accommodate any source or serve any purpose of mere generosity that shall defeat the United States in its privilege to protect itself in the Orient by holding its present position as against foreign intrusion or against any advantage that may be taken over us.

I realize there are no such conditions so serious at this particular moment as to threaten us with invasion; but I invite attention to the fact that such appeared as the condition just before we became embroiled in the conflict with Germany. Such was also the condition of apparent security just before we became engaged in the conflict with Spain.

Mr. President, I apologize to my fellow Members of the Senate for recalling personal experiences. I was a Member of the House of Representatives just before the Spanish-American War broke out. I heard my distinguished fellow Members, some of whom are now Members of this honorable body, proclaim that there was never any danger in anywise whatever and that we should take no steps to anticipate a conflict. Yet we were soon in it. I also observed before the World War, when I was a Member of this body, that honorable gentlemen would constantly admonish us to take no steps that looked in the direction of anticipating a conflict and preparation against it. I invite attention again to the fact that, while we do not charge an intended conflict, we should prepare now against the loss of that which would be our base of defense if conflict should arise among those countries of the world who have made these new alliances with each other for the purpose of increasing their armies and strengthening their navies and enlarging their possessions. I realize there is a maxim of the ancients which I wish to adopt—to "trust in God, but look out for yourself."

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for its consideration.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, it was my purpose today to ask the Senate to take up for immediate consideration Senate Joint Resolution 73, relating to the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art. However, several Senators have advised me that the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is desirous of being present during the consideration of the measure. The Senator from Texas just called the office of the senior Senator from New York and was informed that he is out of town. Not desiring to proceed in his absence in view of the circumstances, I wish to give notice now that next Monday, as soon as I am able to obtain recognition, I shall move that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON POST OFFICES AND POST ROADS

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LUNDEEN in the chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

POSTMASTERS

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent that nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc. That completes the Executive Calendar.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKE] desired to submit a request for unanimous consent for the consideration of a nomination at this time. However, the Senator is not now in the Chamber, and therefore I shall let the matter go over.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate stand adjourned until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 15, 1937, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate March 12, 1937

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MARCH 12, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou who art the wisdom of the ages, let us feel Thy presence breathing life and balm into our natures. We raise our prayer to Thee, saying: Unto Thy name be all glory and power forever and ever. Bestow upon us the blessing of Thy spirit, full of vital, stimulating strength; do Thou fill our hearts with gladness and our souls with vibrating joy. We pray Thee to order our steps in Thy word so that no wickedness shall have dominion over us. Show the light of Thy countenance upon these, Thy servants, for Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness and Thy law is truth. Lofty in morals, let it lead the way to the dignities and treasures of an exalted manhood. We thank Thee for Thine only begotten Son. In Him was no temper of vanity, of greed, or of passion. With steadfast vigor may we be able to go on and know the Lord. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, Wednesday, March 11, 1937, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 635. An act for the relief of Mary Daley;

H. R. 1245. An act for the relief of Malinda J. Mast and William Lee Mast; and

H. R. 2773. An act to authorize the settlement of individual claims for personal property lost or damaged, arising out of the activities of the Civilian Conservation Corps, which have been approved by the Secretary of War.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 118. An act for the relief of Harry D. McIntosh;

S. 294. An act for the relief of Elmer Blair;

S. 315. An act for the relief of George W. Hanna and Bertha M. Hanna;

S. 556. An act for the relief of W. B. Greeley;

S. 843. An act for the relief of Guy F. Allen, chief disbursing officer, Division of Disbursement, Treasury Department;

S. 1057. An act for the relief of Joseph A. Ganong; and

S. 1068. An act for the relief of Earl W. Thomas.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on pending legislation and to quote very briefly from a House report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting some excerpts from a speech which I delivered at Long Beach, Calif., on the 8th of this month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the 1936 tax bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein some excerpts from a speech made by the Honorable Robert H. Jackson, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

THE NEUTRALITY BILL

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 151.

House Resolution 151

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, a joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the joint resolution and continue not to exceed 10 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the joint resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of a point of order the substitute amendment recommended by the Committee on Foreign Affairs and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall rise and report the joint resolution to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the joint resolution and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. Speaker, while I do not ordinarily prefer to read my remarks, I believe the measure which we are about to consider presents such a grave matter for our consideration that what I have to say in the first instance I shall read, and I respectfully prefer not to be queried until I have completed these remarks.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 151, just read, is an open rule providing for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, the Neutrality Act, as amended by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The rule provides for 10 hours' general debate, with every opportunity afforded for the offering of amendments. The importance of the subject and the proposed legislation justifies the long debate provided.

At the outset I wish to again state, especially for the attention of the new Members, that in reporting a rule for the consideration of a measure, the Rules Committee does not give the measure its "blessing", nor can it be assumed that all the members of the Rules Committee, or even a majority of that committee, favor the measure or all its terms. It has happened on many an occasion that many members of the Rules Committee have voted against the final passage of a measure which they previously reported to the House for its consideration.

The prime function of the Rules Committee is to serve the other standing committees of the House and the organization of the House. When it is considered that a measure is of sufficient importance to be laid before the membership for consideration, the Rules Committee acts, irrespective of the individual views of its members as to the merits of the proposal.

It is in following out that function that the Rules Committee now brings this measure before the House.

In the 10 hours' general debate and in the consideration of amendments it is hoped that much light will be thrown upon this most important issue. Few proposals which have or may come before us equal this program of "neutrality" in its importance and possible consequences.

It is doubtless true that since the close of the World War in 1918 there has grown up in this country a definite and outspoken aversion to war, and especially to our involvement in any war in which other nations are the chief contenders. While extreme emotional urge or even ultra pacifism may be partially behind the almost universal expression of the people, there is no question as to public sentiment in the matter. This may or may not account for the ease with which "neutrality" proposals are favored in Congress in recent years. Of course, it is gratuitous for me to state that despite any public clamor we as duly elected representatives should keep our feet on the ground and soberly arrive at a conclusion which is for the best interest of the country. Is this proposal such?

The word "neutrality" has been much mouthed. Neutrality is not an attribute of the normal human being. Human nature has so endowed man that he just must take sides in any contest or on any issue. Can nations, mere aggregations of human beings, rise above this human trait?

Can an individual, or even a nation, see a bully picking on a child and remain neutral? Was not that one of the impelling situations which dragged us into the World War?

It should also be borne in mind that the legislation before us is not temporary. It does not merely amend or extend the existing temporary resolution of neutrality which expires on May 1 of this year. Under the joint resolution, which we shall presently consider, the country would adopt a permanent policy of "neutrality", not knowing what situations may arise in the future. This consideration involves the question whether what we now do here shall be of a temporary or a permanent nature. Would it be better to extend the existing legislation?

In the hearing before the Rules Committee it was not contended that this legislation, either as it passed the other body or as it has been recommended by our House committee, had the approval or was desired by the administration. That is a matter which should be cleared up before the debate is finished. Does the proposal give the Chief Executive too much power, or does it fail to give him sufficient power or discretion for the purposes intended? Does the Chief Executive want such a grave responsibility lodged in his hands? Will it involve us in war? And more important still, does it infringe upon the constitutional prerogative of Congress to declare war? Personally, that is one right of Congress I should never vote to surrender to any Executive. [Applause.]

It is admitted by some of the most ardent supporters of this proposal that it is a complete reversal—an open, an avowed retreat—from this country's invariable insistence in the freedom of the seas. Should we make that turnabout? What will be the consequences to our national interests, to our foreign trade, with its millions of employees?

Under the cash-and-carry feature of the proposal, will our American ships lie idle in our ports, and will the millions of our workers engaged in foreign trade walk our streets unemployed while all shipping is conducted by other nations, or by even one nation which may control the seas? Will the floating armament of other nations be engaged in naval battle at the very gateways of our ports, with the possible damage to our cities and our people?

In such an event—even as to the tying up of our shipping trade, will there be such public protests and demonstrations of a riotous nature as there occurred early in the nineteenth century when President Thomas Jefferson imposed similar embargoes?

Further, in considering such legislation, thoughtful persons will naturally look carefully into the detail of the proposal to see if any selfish interests may be served—either the extreme and complete surrender—the ultrapacifist, or the Communist or the Socialist with like views, or the citizen or resident here who has a greater interest in some other nation than ours. They will look to see if any portion of the measure favors any business interest, munition making, financial, shipping, or other. They will carefully scrutinize the legislation to see if the bill will result, even to the extent of giving an undue advantage to any other nation, whether at our own expense or to the preferment of some other nation over other countries.

Is this bill, as is claimed in some quarters, "an Anglo-American alliance"? If it is, do our people want to enter into such a partnership to the detriment of other nations and contrary to our traditional policy of an equal attitude toward all the nations of the world?

There surely are citizens other than myself who do not favor such a closed corporation. Let us, therefore, approach the consideration of this proposal with these queries in our mind, unmoved by any emotional drive, but with our faces set foursquare toward a calm consideration of what is best for our people and our country.

Neutrality may be a consummation devoutly to be wished, but it should not be inconsiderately rushed into without first counting the cost to the American people. Is it going to be our policy of "neutrality at any cost." [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the proposal of which the pending rule is a forerunner, if enacted into law, will mark the beginning of a new peace policy for the United States.

I am not a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee, and neither am I an expert on international law, and therefore I cannot be expected to fully understand and expound the mechanics of this very complicated measure.

While I am devoted to peace and am willing to make any sane and practical sacrifice to keep our country out of war, I confess that it is with considerable misgivings that I see Uncle Sam abandon a national policy for which the War of 1812 was heroically fought and brilliantly won. I refer to the war which established for this Nation in its infancy the freedom of the seas. However, much as I revere this distinguished heritage which has come down to us, I am perfectly willing to compromise or even deny ourselves the exercise of these rights if by doing so we can avoid the horror and desolation and misery of war.

In studying this proposal, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hope it engenders is an illusory one. I wonder if the exercise of the provisions embodied in this resolution will not be rather calculated to involve us in war with foreign nations than promote peaceful relations with them.

The passage of this resolution, in my opinion, will be a distinct disappointment to that group of pacifists in this country who contend that our neutrality should be absolutely and unequivocally mandatory. This group has become so war conscious that they want us to shun and abandon every appearance of military strength or intention, even to the point of reducing our national defense to the very minimum, or preferably by doing away with it altogether.

I should like to have seen this measure less discretionary and more mandatory, but I most emphatically disagree with our pacifist friends on the subject of national defense. In my judgment, the surest way to avoid war is by maintaining an adequate national defense. I do not mean by that that we should undertake to compete with certain European nations who are today engaged in mad and vulgar rivalry for military supremacy, which will ultimately and inevitably lead to national suicide. However, it is manifest to me that our greatest security depends on an adequate system of national defense, and the sooner we have it the better for the interests of this great Republic.

In attempting to study and analyze this measure, it has occurred to me that entirely too much authority is vested in the Executive. Practically every condition and contingency set up in this measure is based upon Presidential discretion. The President, in his discretion, is authorized to ascertain that a state of war exists, and, excepting arms, munitions, and implements of war, and cash-and-carriage sales of other commodities which he in his discretion may render free from embargo, the President's discretion is absolutely unlimited. And, as I understand it, the measure which we have before us today eliminates the word "cash" as a mandatory condition.

Personally, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a great deal of logic in the argument that American merchantmen should not be permitted to trade with belligerent nations; and certainly if they do they should be required to do so at their own peril. But even then, such might lead to consequences fraught with great danger to the peace of this country. Even should our merchantmen confine their cargo to commodities not included in the President's proscription, they would be subject to the rules of international law, such as search and seizure, and to blockade. These are the risks they must assume under existing law as well as under the provisions of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with the position taken by Senator BORAH in that it occurs to me that this measure is in some respects "immoral." Under its terms it is proposed that we take the profits and let someone else take the risk. We may sell belligerent nations commodities which are not in the proscribed classes, and take the profits, and then like Pontius Pilate, assume an air of sanctified innocence and wash our hands of all responsibility.

Might this not have the effect to involve us in war? It will certainly elicit the contempt and resentment of such belligerent nations as will not have the facilities or the opportunity to avail themselves of our unrestricted markets.

This measure, without design, of course, provides a distinct advantage to Great Britain and to Japan, due to their geographical location and relation to the United States. Only Great Britain could purchase with safety our commodities and convoy freighters and transports in the Atlantic and the same situation applies to Japan in the Pacific. It can readily be seen that this situation is calculated to not only excite the hatred and ill will of the weaker belligerents against the United States, but may result in serious permanent injury to our commerce in the future in the way of retaliation. Say, for instance, that Great Britain and Germany should become involved in war. Of course, due to her powerful Navy and her strategic geographical location, Great Britain would enjoy a decided advantage over Germany in the matter of obtaining necessary commodities such as oil, cotton, and food products from this country. This fact of itself would prejudice Germany or any other country similarly situated against us, because oil, cotton, and food products are as indispensable to the successful prosecution of war as arms and ammunition. In this instance, Germany would be forced to go to South America or elsewhere for her cotton, oil, and food products, and after the war is over she would naturally continue to patronize the country from whom she obtained supplies during her extremity, and thus the American cotton producer, oil producer, and farmer would permanently lose a valuable foreign customer.

And, furthermore, Mr. Speaker, if goods bought and paid for before leaving port are allowed to be shipped in American bottoms, flying the American flag and manned by American seamen, it is apparent that we will expose ourselves to depredations which might precipitate us into war. Belligerent nations do not respect international law or neutrality enactments. These become mere scraps of paper when men are dying on the seas or on the battlefields. We saw the folly of this false sense of security fully exploded during the World War.

In my opinion, the commodity provisions of this bill contain the greatest war-provoking possibilities and potentialities. This provision, you will observe, is a discretionary one, and, unless administered most discreetly, is calculated to embroil us in war, or certainly elicit for ourselves the hatred of nations.

Mr. Speaker, let us not lull ourselves into the delusion that the passage of this resolution will remove all possibilities of war. Much as I should like to see our "swords beaten into plowshares and our spears into pruning hooks" and the nations of the earth "learn war no more", as prophesied by Isaiah, I fear that the passage of this measure would hardly justify that action by the United States at the present moment or even if this bill should pass and become law. So long as the nations of the earth are afflicted and actuated by avarice and cupidity we will doubless have wars. Of course, we can lessen the possibilities of war by friendly gesture and convention. This measure has this desideratum as its objective. And while I am not fully satisfied with the provisions of this resolution, I shall support it notwithstanding, because I believe that it is a step in the right direction. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this rule to bring up the McReynolds bill, although I cannot vote for its passage in its present form. There are certain provisions in the measure which I feel are likely to bring us into war. We all want peace and will do everything we can to keep out of war.

Of course, we all know, Mr. Speaker, no matter what so-called neutrality legislation we may pass, we may be embroiled in war. There are certain insults that the United States cannot stand.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to read into the RECORD a short paragraph from a German newspaper, a copy of which was carried in the Herald Tribune.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. This deals with an alleged insult by the German newspaper to American womanhood—to a certain group of American women, to be sure, but to all American womanhood. I quote from the text of Der Angriff's editorial:

> But the climax is to be found in an orgy of insult before a thousand Jewish women, whom he—
> Mayor LaGuardia—
> fetched in from the streets so that he might have an applauding audience.
> They are speaking of the mayor of New York—
> Of course, this Jewish inciter and apostle, with his cheap Jewish brain, cannot understand what it means to insult the leader of 70,000,000 people. One would think, however, that the White House in Washington would have sufficient power to forbid procurers who climb high to tell their dirty stories to a thousand women instead of to one woman.

I read this into the RECORD, Mr. Speaker, because I find so few people in the United States realize what the press of Germany is actually saying about American womanhood, and, of course, Mr. Speaker, we all know that the German press is controlled by the present Government of that country. Der Angriff attacked our American institutions; it also attacked unjustifiably our American women.

I went to the State Department a week ago to express my indignation in the matter, and I hoped that something would be done in the way of a protest to the German Government. I was at the State Department yesterday and had an interview with Secretary Hull. I sincerely hope his protest to Germany, made yesterday, will bring regrets from the German Government.

I am not rattling any sabers, but I do know that American manhood bitterly resents the apparent attitude of the present German Government, through its press, toward American womanhood. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, at this time I understand that the protest to which the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] referred has already been made by the American Government.

Mr. MAPES. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] has cast some aspersions upon the German press and their alleged attacks upon American womanhood, but I am wondering whether she speaks from personal knowledge or if what she says is based on propaganda that has come from some source that is unfriendly to the German people.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I have this information from the State Department, of reports that have come from Berlin; and it is the first time in the history of this country, so far as I can find, that the press of any country has ever attacked American womanhood, or the womanhood of any other country.

REMEMBER THE FALSE PROPAGANDA OF THE GREAT WAR

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that we should convict a great people upon ex-parte testimony. I can recall back in 1914, '15, and '16 when the world was fed up on tales from across the water of German atrocities. We were told that German soldiers mutilated noncombatants, and ruthlessly and needlessly destroyed private property on every hand. That propaganda continued until it had worked the American people into a pitch of frenzy that finally drove them into war.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Not now. After the war was over we found they were all lies, put out by the Allies in order to inflame the American people. Did we not learn something from that experience, which nearly wrecked our country? Are we going to permit ourselves to be inflamed by similar stories today? I do not think we should take cognizance of the weird and unusual tales that come to us from across the water. We do not know what motives inspire them, but that there is a purpose behind them we may be sure.

LET US GET AT THE TRUTH BEFORE TAKING UMBRAGE AT ALLEGED SLURS

I am in favor of American neutrality. I believe that with 3,000 miles of sea on each side of us we can stay out of these European embroilments, and that we should do so. I do not believe there is a man in this Chamber but will admit that we would have been infinitely better off in every way if we had stayed at home and attended to our affairs in 1917 and 1918 instead of sticking our nose into something that did not concern us. I think it is time that we were pro-Americans rather than pro something else, and for my part I want absolute and indisputable evidence that the German press is being quoted aright before I take umbrage at some will-o'-the-wisp, coming from we know not where, and inspired by we know not whom.

I trust that the gentlewoman from Massachusetts will not take offense at what I have said. I do not question her sincerity, and may I say at this point that if the stories that come to us as to alleged slurs cast upon American womanhood by the German press are true, I resent them as strongly as does she or anyone else. However, if they be true, let us not forget that the provocation, which came from this side of the water, was great.

GERMAN PEOPLE CONTRIBUTED GREATLY TO AMERICAN PROGRESS

I have lived among Americans of German extraction all my life. No people have contributed more to the upbuilding of America than have they, and no class of our citizens are more law abiding, thrifty, honorable, and chivalrous than are they and their descendants. The Germans contributed materially to the success of the American Revolution, and in the war for the preservation of the Union they wrote a record that stands out in letters of living light.

It has been my privilege to have traveled in Germany. I found the German people as kindly and high-minded as any other people, and in some instances more so. American soldiers with the army of occupation will bear me out in this statement.

WE SHOULD PRESERVE PEACEFUL RELATIONS WITH GERMANY

We may not agree with the form of government that they now have, and it may be possible that they do not altogether approve of ours, but I submit in all fairness that it is their own affair as to what form of government they choose to live under, just as our form of government is our sole affair. We are at peace with the German Government and the German people, and we should use every endeavor to continue that happy condition.

Those who are spreading propaganda which cannot but have for its result the impairment of these peaceful relations are disloyal to our Government, and I care not who they be nor from whence they come.

NEUTRALITY BILL ONE OF MOST DIFFICULT QUESTIONS FOR CONGRESS TO DECIDE

Mr. Speaker, we have before us today the neutrality bill. Of all the questions that this Congress will be called upon to grapple with, this is by far the most difficult to solve. The Senate has passed a neutrality bill that is based upon a cash-and-carry policy. In my opinion such a neutrality law manifestly would favor nations having large navies, such as Great Britain and Japan, and would operate against countries with small navies. A cash-and-carry neutrality law would not in effect be neutrality at all.

Our task is to ascertain what policy is best for the American people. It would seem to me that a true neutrality law should in time of war obligate us to discontinue commerce with all belligerent nations and sell only to neutrals. If we were to adopt such a policy, and it is the only kind that will keep us out of future wars, we should proclaim to the world that we will insist upon the freedom of the seas for American ships; also that we will not tolerate the search and seizure of American vessels while plying between our shores and neutral ports. We made a cowardly surrender of that right during the World War, and as a result were dragged into that war. Far better would it be to forego all foreign commerce during wartimes and allow grass to grow on our streets than to needlessly become mixed up in another war, which would perhaps result in national bankruptcy and the destruction of our civilization. Let us not act hastily in this matter. It is of too great importance.

WE SHOULD ACT WITH CAUTION IN OUR FOREIGN RELATIONS

There has never been a time in the history of the Republic when we should act with greater caution in foreign affairs. Europe is today arming with feverish haste in preparation for the next war. We must do everything within our power to keep out of that war, and in this connection I want to call your attention to House Joint Resolution 199, introduced by Mr. LUDLOW, of Indiana, which calls for an amendment to the Constitution providing that henceforth no war, save a war of defense, or to repel invasion, shall be declared until affirmative action shall have been taken by a majority of all votes cast thereon in a Nation-wide referendum of the American people. Congress should lose no time in submitting Mr. LUDLOW's amendment to the American people for ratification. Had the Constitution contained such a provision back in 1917 we would not have been dragged into the World War. In the meantime let me urge my countrymen to be on guard against all foreign propaganda that is intended to inflame our people and arouse animosity and hatred which can only drag us into foreign entanglements with which we have no concern.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has consumed 5 minutes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

PROVOCATION FOR ALLEGED SLURS BY GERMAN PRESS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I shall not take more than a moment; but, of course, if the reports are not true in respect to the German press, it will be very easy for the German Government to say they are not true and to express regret.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentlewoman will admit there was some provocation from this side of the water.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think this side of the water is perfectly able to take care of itself. The Secretary of State sent his regrets to the German Ambassador in Washington, and that the gentleman [Mayor LaGuardia] referred to on this side of the water is able to fight his own battles; but if it be correct that the German Government controls the German press and the German papers have so attacked American womanhood in such an untrue, unjust, and unwarranted way, then this country should not rest until Germany expresses regret.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that this rule provides for 10 hours of debate because of the importance of the subject that is covered by the legislation. It does involve a change of national policy; there is no doubt about that. I think this country, profiting by experience of the past, both of wars in which we have engaged and wars now in progress, desires to promote peace, and that that is the prevailing sentiment of the country, and that this Nation is willing to do that even at the cost of some sacrifice. Very often sacrifices must be made of natural rights and of liberties, technical rights, if peace is to be promoted. We have all had the experience of that kind, and have had observations in communities and in families. Everywhere we see peace frequently promoted by the making of some sacrifice. There is the old doctrine of the freedom of the seas and we all revere it, but if the exercise of that freedom is to carry our people or products into a war zone that will involve us in controversy, may it not be better that we set some example to the world and make some sacrifice of that ancient doctrine or right in order to promote a better doctrine and a higher civilization than the world has yet known?

The chief controversy in this bill, as I understand it, is whether we shall have neutrality of a mandatory character or neutrality as this bill provides that is somewhat discretionary, lodging the power in the President and his advisers. To make it mandatory, according to my feeling, would be a further departure from the ancient doctrine of freedom of the seas, because the Executive would not have any discretion, and there might be times when the country should exercise that discretion as to whether we should exercise the same policy toward all nations that are at war, where one is the aggressor and the other a victim, or shall have a mandatory neutrality where there shall be a hard-and-fast rule that shall be fixed against all nations alike. Each foreign controversy or war may offer a different set of circumstances or facts that we would like to weigh at the time that we impose these principles or carry out this law.

It would seem to me it would be better to have the discretion in the hands of the Chief Executive and his advisers to make those decisions under the set of circumstances that may arise. Whether it shall be mandatory as to certain fixed commodities is very difficult to decide. We know there are certain commodities that we feel would be included in any Executive order, but there may be other commodities which, under a particular set of circumstances, should be included or should be withdrawn. So far as I am concerned, I feel that a law which places discretion in the President to exercise in the light of circumstances as they may arise in the particular controversy is better legislation and is a precautionary step moving in the right direction, but not going so far with a rigid principle that might not apply when those circumstances arise.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. What is the gentleman's position on the question of whether or not commodities—I do not mean materials of war—commodities shall be shipped in American vessels to any belligerent nation, as provided in section 4 of the bill?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I think when those circumstances would arise, when it would become precarious to the peace of this Nation, I am willing to sacrifice that principle of carrying our own commodities in our own vessels into a war zone for what I consider a higher principle of promoting peace under those circumstances. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD] has expired.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, fourscore and seven years ago that great statesman Daniel Webster rose in his place in the Senate of the United States and said: "I speak today as an American. Hear me for my cause." In the tense and strained international condition existing today anyone speaking with those sentiments must of necessity be speaking of neutrality for America, come what may elsewhere over this troubled world of ours.

More than 18 years have elapsed since the whine of the last shell over the fields of France and Belgium. Many there were who thought that we would immediately resume our peaceful ways and things would right themselves shortly. I need tell no one within sound of my voice that today we are still settling for that last holocaust.

We are now far into the eighth year of the greatest business panic the United States has ever known. Staggering sums have been spent by this Government in an effort to relieve the distress caused by this depression and to again get business started on its way. And yet even the most optimistic must in the honesty of his own chamber admit to himself that we are a long way from shore.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that the expenditure of every dollar so spent is the direct result of the so-called World War. And who is to repay those staggering sums? It is true that you and I and all of us here will pay as long as we remain on this earth.

But more than that. It constitutes a first mortgage on the shadowy host that follows us, the millions yet unborn who have yet to pass before the bank of time. That is the most tragic part. You and I and the rest of us may take it as punishment for permittting ourselves to be dragged into that war. But for those unborn millions it is only the sins of the fathers being visited on the children. And if it shall cease with the third and fourth generations, there will be little credit due us.

Mr. Speaker, I want my country, my United States, to adopt as its permanent policy an attitude of "hands off." I do not want to see my country adopt a policy that says to all the world, "We are your friend." But we are also the friend of every nation on the face of the globe so long as that nation behaves itself and acts in a way to warrant the friendship of a civilized nation.

I shall speak and vote for adequate appropriations for national defense. Airplanes superior in equipment and numbers to those possessed by any nation on earth should be provided by this the greatest nation of the earth. And trained pilots in sufficient numbers to make our air force invincible in war will be one of the greatest insurance policies for continued peace that we can provide. And these can be provided at a much less relative cost than the armed and naval forces that are equally essential to preserve our peace and our neutrality.

We are favored in this land of ours by a geographical isolation that is impossible across the waters. But army and navy can never be supplanted by other forces. They are a vital necessity, and because of their nature large increases in their personnel and equipment are more expensive than air equipment.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that we must combine our Army and our Navy under one head. Let us create a department of defense, uniting under one responsible head all the defense units we provide. That will enable us to provide these improvements in our armed units in an economical manner and at the same time increase their efficiency.

Supporting that statement I need only mention that it is now practically universally agreed that the combining of the allied commands under General Foch was the greatest move toward an early conclusion of the war. Why should the Army operate independent of the Navy? And who is there to pretend that two air forces, one for the Army and one for the Navy, are either economical or efficient?

We must remember that while the need for this preparedness is great because it is necessary to correlate with an official attitude of "keep your hands off of us", that it can only be provided out of the taxpayers of the Nation. My people have gone through a period of devastating droughts and plagues of grasshoppers that have left them seriously crippled in their ability to pay. Let us, therefore, temper the wind by giving them a full hundred cents' value for every dollar we must assess against them in the way of taxes.

Now, this should not be accompanied by the building up of a professional Army and Navy group. We have in this country millions of the veterans of the late war. They it was who bared themselves to the deadly blast of the foe. To me they are best represented by an incident that happened in late September in the closing year of the war. It was told by a lieutenant that in the chill of the late afternoon a company was lined up with orders to go up front for the first time. In the distance could be heard the artillery fire. Lining up his men, he said, "Men, we are going up to the battle line. Some of you will not be coming back. But let every man remember he is an American soldier. Let every man go with a smile on his face." And every man went with a smile.

That represents the spirit of our defenders in the late war. They are the ones who should serve as the leaders in a program to keep America eternally and forever out of the troubles, real or imaginary, of the other nations. They are the ones who have the real horrors of war indelibly impressed upon their minds, never to be removed. They have seen all sides of the war. They have seen the glamour of parades and waving crowds and bands replaced by the grimness of the actuality—the mud and the slime of the trenches, bodies of their comrades rotting in a no man's land or being used as carrion by the fat and ugly trench rat.

No, my friends; we want no professional Army. But we do want neutrality. That we propose to have. And we want it by adopting an official attitude that we have no interest in the bickerings of any other of the nations of the earth, backed up by providing a line of defense that will say to the world and to every nation in the world, "We should like to be your friend; but we want to be friendly to every other nation, and we are not going to mix in your wars. But if you ever make a false move against us, we have the equipment to blow you to 'kingdom come'; and we will not hesitate a moment to do it."

In that way this Government can obtain a lasting peace and serve as a model for what government ought to be.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days after the passage of the bill within which to extend their own remarks on the rule and the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

The was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman withhold that until this vote is taken?

The SPEAKER. A constitutional question has been raised. It is the duty of the Chair to count.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman not withdraw the point of order?

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order for the present.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by including a copy of a letter which I have sent.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously there is not a quorum present.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 30]

Allen, Del.	Douglas	Lord	Smith, Va.
Andrews	Drew, Pa.	Mahon, S. C.	Smith, Wash.
Binderup	Driver	Maloney	Somers, N. Y.

Curley	Kniffin	Seger
Delaney	Lamneck	Shannon
Dingell	Lewis, Md.	Smith, Maine

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and fifty-one Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

On motion of Mr. McREYNOLDS, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

EXPLANATION OF ROLL CALL

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, on roll call no. 29 of yesterday I was recorded as absent. I should like the RECORD, with the Speaker's permission, to show that I was at a meeting of a subcommittee of my committee at that time.

NEUTRALITY ACT OF 1937

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent States; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, the Neutrality Act of 1937, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the resolution was dispensed with.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I should like the Members to give me their attention for a short time while I undertake to explain the bill we now have under consideration, and should like them to refrain from asking me to yield during that time. When I finish the explanation of the bill I shall be glad to yield to any Member and endeavor to answer such question as he may ask.

Mr. Chairman, every Member recognizes the interest of the people of the United States in proper neutrality legislation. The idea is prevalent that neutrality legislation can be so perfected that it can keep us out of war. No legislation can keep us out of war, but we can pass legislation perhaps controlling shipments of war materials and controlling the conduct of our people with certain limitations that will enable us and assist us in keeping out of war. All are trying to reach the same goal. The question is the remedy.

Your committee has considered this matter from every angle. Many theories of mandatory neutrality have been suggested which if enacted into legislation would precipitate us into war. Some people seem to be sold on mandatory legislation. I will discuss this in detail later. I think I can show the fallacy of that argument under certain conditions. The Senate passed a neutrality bill, which came over to the House a few days ago, was referred to the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, was stricken, and we now have before us for consideration the House bill as an original bill; and it is the House bill that I shall undertake to define and explain, section by section, so that those Members who have not given it particular study will know what is in the bill.

The second section of the bill consists of definitions of the various terms used in the bill, such as "United States", "person", "vessel", "American vessel", "vehicle", "board", and so forth. This obviates the necessity of repeating lengthy phrases in many places throughout the bill when one word will cover it.

The third section of this bill deals with the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. This provision is mandatory. Whenever the President issues a proclamation that a state of war exists between two certain countries, the bill provides that thereafter it shall be unlawful to export or attempt to export or cause to be exported arms, ammunition, implements of war, and so forth, to any belligerent country or to any neutral country for transshipment to a belligerent. This is the law at the present time on the statute books, but, if not reenacted, it will expire on May 1 next. The only addition that has been made in this section is to cover civil strife whenever that civil strife reaches such extent that it might be called "warfare", and whenever the President has to issue another proclamation showing that our neutrality is involved, or in order to save the lives and commerce of the people of the United States. This is the only addition to the present law in this section.

The pending bill differs somewhat from the Pittman bill, but I am not discussing the Pittman bill at this juncture.

The bill now under consideration provides that the President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms, ammunition, or implements of war, and so forth, shipment of which is prohibited. This he has been doing under existing law in the case of other wars. He is given authority, after the state of war ceases to exist, to withdraw the restrictions.

Section 4 deals with the export of other articles and materials and is what might be called the commodities section. Here is where the main differences exist between the House bill and the Senate bill. There being such a difference between the Senate bill, known as the Pittman bill, and this bill, I shall undertake to define what the House bill does and also point out the differences between the two bills so that the Members will understand them if they have not studied the two bills.

Considering first subsection (a) of section 4 of the House bill:

Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 3 of this act—

That is, a proclamation that war exists—

and he shall thereafter find that the placing of restrictions on the shipment of certain articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war from the United States to said belligerents named in the proclamation issued under said section 3—

Commodities of war, such as copper, oil, cotton; in fact, probably all articles will be made contraband if the same policy is followed in a future war as was followed in the World War—or to a State wherein civil strife has been proclaimed to exist, is deemed necessary.

In that case not only is there issued the proclamation that a state of war exists, but if under these conditions the President deems it necessary he shall have authority to, and shall, issue another proclamation prohibiting the shipment in American vessels of certain materials which he may specify.

Now, why is it left that way? That is the Pittman bill. The House bill has an exception in this respect: "Except under certain limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe." That clause appears in the House bill and for what purpose? I will undertake to tell you why we placed that in there.

You will remember that under this bill, if its provisions are carried out, they can come here, buy articles and pay for them; and American vessels may go at any time to neutral countries or to those sections of the world which would not likely involve us in war. The omission of the clause "Except under certain limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe" in paragraph (a) which I just called attention to in the Pittman bill would make it necessary if the President decided to place the provisions of that paragraph into operation to make them applicable to exportations to any territory or belligerent without reference to the necessities of the case. I especially call this to the attention of the Members who represent border States along the Great Lakes—New York, Ohio, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and other States. I ask you to note the effect of this legislation on your shipments on the Lakes if this provision is not retained in the House bill.

Mr. Chairman, remember that this is permanent legislation. Sometimes I feel it is unfortunate, because it is hard to look into the future and undertake to tell what kind of war may arise or what may be necessary to keep us out of war. The inclination of the people of the United States, it would seem from the Senate bill, and some Members of this House, was to keep out of the last war.

Let me take the following illustration: If Great Britain should become a belligerent and Canada should participate, and she would, and, assuming further, hostilities on the sea were confined to a region adjacent to the British Isles and were of such a nature that American vessels entering the region adjacent to the British Isles would be in grave danger, of course the President in that case would put this section into effect. The President, in order to prevent American vessels from carrying certain commodities, presumably contraband, into that area, would be obliged to prohibit American vessels from carrying the same commodities between Rochester and Toronto or between Detroit and Windsor. See what it would do for your trade and yet you are not in any danger in the shipment of goods between Chicago and Montreal, or between Cleveland and other places on the Canadian side. Let me direct the attention of the Representatives from Washington State to the shipment of goods between Seattle and Vancouver, between Seattle and Australia, between San Francisco and Australia, and so forth. That is your mandatory provision. Are you for it? Do you want to destroy your commerce? Do you want to destroy your shipping interests when there is no necessity for it and when the war zone is in another part of the world? Yet you say you are for the mandatory provision. Such examples could be multiplied ad infinitum.

On the other hand, the introduction of a clause we have placed in this section reading, "Except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe", would enable the President to put the provisions of the paragraph into operation in such measure and to such degree as changing circumstances might from day to day indicate was necessary in the interest of this country. I want you to listen closely, because your committee is right about this matter. That is not all.

Let us go further. I may say while I am on subsection (a) the reason the President is given discretion in naming commodities arises from the fact, first, that all commodities might not be contraband, but whenever they were contraband the President likely would name every commodity contraband and an American vessel under that section could not carry them abroad.

What does subsection (b) mean? Here is what that section does, and I want you to listen to this. There is another difference and we think we are right. Under subsection (b), as the President issues a proclamation that a war exists between two countries, that section of the Pittman bill goes into effect. It makes no difference what character of war it may be. It makes no difference if we are in no danger. It goes immediately into effect. You will remember if you once lose your connections or trade you will lose it for any and all purposes. Some have said, "Of course, you would sacrifice trade to save human lives." I say, "Yes; and I would have trade to save human lives." This section provides that as soon as the proclamation is issued then no goods may be sold to any belligerent nation or to any neutral for transmission without the title, having been transferred. Our bill virtually says there is no use putting this into effect until there is a reason and that reason is to maintain our neutrality and to preserve the lives and the commerce of this country. Then the President puts it into effect. But we have the same restriction, "under certain limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe."

The omission in paragraph (b) in the Pittman bill of those introductory clauses which appear in paragraph (b) of the House bill would have the effect of putting the provisions of that paragraph automatically into effect. Should Persia, Afghanistan, Latvia, or Estonia become involved in a war in which the neutrality of the United States was in no wise endangered, the cumbersome machinery necessary to enforce the provisions of the paragraph would immediately have to be set up and placed in operation.

Let me use this illustration again. I call attention of you Members representing districts along the Great Lakes, although it affects the whole country. Should Great Britain become involved in a war in any part of the world and Canada assumed the technical status of a belligerent, all of the provisions of the paragraph would automatically and effectually apply to exports to Canada.

The result would be that no American citizen could cross with an automobile into Canada without first selling his automobile to a foreigner, because it means a transfer of title. That is the construction of this act. I defy anyone to question that construction of the Pittman bill. It cannot be done.

No American citizen could even cross into Canada with a handbag of toilet articles without first selling them to a foreigner.

The tens of thousands of American citizens who own cottages or camps in Canada would have to spend their summers at home unless they could find it possible to divest themselves of all right, title, and interest in any personal effects or household or camp equipment which they might wish to send or take with them into that country.

The absurd dislocation of economic interests which would result from this situation and the immeasurable loss and inconvenience to American citizens might have no relation whatever to the preservation of American neutrality.

The inclusion of the introductory clause in the House bill, on the other hand, has the effect of retaining all of the useful provisions of the paragraph, while at the same time endowing them with that flexibility and executive discretion in their application which is necessary in order to obviate totally unnecessary sacrifices on the part of American citizens.

If the paragraph as it is written in the House bill were to become law, the Executive could make its provisions operative to such measure and in such degree as changing circumstances from day to day might dictate in the interest of this country.

These are the principal differences in the commodity section between the Pittman bill and the House bill. I have undertaken to show you why we made these differences, which I think are absolutely sufficient.

FINANCIAL TRANSACTIONS

There is one small amendment to section 5, to what is the law at this time. As you will remember, doubtless, after such proclamation is issued by the President, belligerents, and so forth, are prohibited from selling bonds and securities in this country. In other words, a foreign nation cannot finance its war in the United States of America.

There is only one amendment, and since it seems to create a great uproar from a certain class of people in this country, I will alone assume the responsibility for suggesting having that amendment placed in this bill. I may have had some doubt when the amendment went in the bill as to its propriety, but since the bill has been up for consideration, and in view of the character of the opposition which has arisen, I am more convinced than ever I am right on this provision.

The words to which I refer appear in line 24, on page 23, following the words:

Or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government or person—

And they are as follows:

Or to solicit or receive any contribution for any such government or political subdivision, or any person acting for or on behalf of such government or subdivision.

If we are to remain neutral in this country, we must keep our people as neutral as possible. No European war ever starts but what certain people from this country are fighting on one side or the other, or on both sides. That was demonstrated last year when the Italo-Ethiopian war was going on at the time when this neutrality bill was before this House for consideration by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. It has been demonstrated during this session at a time when civil war is being waged in Spain. Certain people are soliciting and collecting funds to be sent to one side or the other.

Therefore, I thought it was proper to stop that practice as far as possible in order to keep from creating strife in this country.

A misunderstanding of these words in this bill is prevalent. Let me correct that misunderstanding by saying that it would not be unlawful, if this bill becomes law, to solicit or receive funds for the American Red Cross, the International Red Cross, or any other organization set up in such States for relief so long as such organization is not a party of the Government. This is what the provision means.

I am now going to digress a bit, not from the subject, but just do a little side talking. I received a telegram this morning, and I want to pay my respects to the sender. I cannot hold it up any longer. I want the Members of the House to listen to this telegram. It reads:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1937.

HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE,
Capitol Hill, Washington, D. C.:

Feel that McReynolds so-called neutrality bill is actually not neutrality bill, but pro-Fascist and not in keeping with American traditions. Urge its defeat.

Now, this is all right—I have had worse than this, but where did this come from? It is signed "Social Security Board Union", who are civil-service employees. If this is what civil service means, then we had better take them all out of civil service—if they are undertaking to dictate to this House. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Not right now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I should like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. All American citizens have the right of petition.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I have nothing to say about these men and women, even those who are among the W. P. A. workers, but when an organization right under the dome of the Capitol is organized and undertakes to condemn men in Congress and denounce their legislation without knowing what it is about, then I think it is time for us to take cognizance of such action. [Applause.]

I called up and located the president of this union. He had been under civil service for 4 months, but his period of probation was not over, and I told him worse things than I am telling you now. I then called the Civil Service Commission and said, "Have you rules that would control a matter of this kind?" They said, "I think not." I then stated, "You had better draw up some"; and I said further, "I understand this organization has already made a request of the Social Security Board not to advance anyone except by seniority"; and I asked, "Have you any rule that takes care of that?" He said, "I think not." I then said, "If you have a merit system, you had better draw yourselves some more rules."

I am not objecting to any American citizen's protesting against legislation—and I have protests of various kinds against this section, and I could tell you whence they come, and I will at a later time—but when we have men here in the departments that undertake to dictate to the Members of this House and denounce legislation in which they are not concerned, then I say that such people, every one of them, ought to fired, and I believe this House will agree with me. [Applause.]

They not only did this, but the State Department, within the last few days, has refused to issue passports for people going to Spain in order to keep our people out of that country, where they might become involved, and these people condemned the State Department. What do you think of that? They had hardly got a job down there before doing this.

I realize I am digressing somewhat, but when I thought of this matter I could not let it go by, I may say to the gentleman from Ohio. I promised him I would try to explain this bill, and this is one of the small things involved.

This carries us to section 6. It will not take me very long on the balance of the bill, because nearly all of it is the law at the present time.

This section deals with American vessels prohibited from carrying arms. This is the law at the present time, and is in the Pittman bill and in my bill, and I presume there is no use discussing this further.

The next section is section 7, which refers to the use of American ports as a base of supply. This is also the law at the present time, and used to be the law before the present measure was written.

The next is section 8, with respect to submarines and armed merchant vessels. We already have this section, except there has been added to the present section, "or armed merchant vessels." With this addition to the section it is the law at the present time, so I presume there is no reason for going into this section further.

The next section relates to travel by American nationals on belligerent vessels. This section provides:

> Whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation or proclamations as provided in section 3 of this act and he shall thereafter find that the maintenance of peace between the United States, and foreign states, or the protection of the lives of citizens of the United States, or the protection of the commercial interests of the United States and its citizens, or the security of the United States requires that American citizens should refrain from traveling on the vessels of the state or states named in the said proclamation or proclamations, he shall so proclaim, and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessel of the state or states named in the proclamation or proclamations issued pursuant to section 3 of this act, except under such limitations and in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe.

I will tell you the reason for this. We have American citizens on various islands of the sea, and they would have no chance to get off of these islands, but would become marooned there unless the President could prescribe that they could leave on other vessels, or they may want to send diplomatic representatives on these boats or newspaper correspondents under certain conditions.

So that is the reason that this provision is put in there, so that the President can control it, and I think it is a very reasonable provision.

Then we have the National Munitions Control Board. I presume most of the Members are familiar with that. We have two or three amendments to that. One I will tell you of is very short. The license under the original bill provided for the payment of $500. It has been demonstrated that this would work a great hardship on many people who are engaged in that enterprise. Some of their profits will be entirely eaten up. We provided that on all business over $50,000 they should pay the $500 license, and that under that they should pay $100. There are 155 who have taken out licenses, as I remember the number, and there are only about 8 or 10 who would be exempt and be entitled to this reduction. We thought that is a reasonable amendment; and then there are two or three little amendments not of much account. The remainder of the bill is in respect to regulation by the President. Of course, the American republics are exempted. That is the law at the present time. Then the penalties are similar to what they have been in the law, and there is the authorization for appropriations and the repeal section.

That covers this bill that you now have before you, the House bill. I shall be glad now to yield to any gentleman who desires to ask a question.

Mr. BEAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. BEAM. I was interested in the statement the gentleman made relative to shipping facilities, particularly on the Great Lakes and particularly as affecting Chicago. As I understand it, under the original Pittman bill, if a state of war should exist between Great Britain and any other foreign power, the President could shut off travel or transportation or commercial exchanges between Canada and this country.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If Canada were involved, and she would likely be, the President would not have to do it. It would be done automatically under the Pittman bill.

Mr. BEAM. Under the terms of the gentleman's bill, how would it be affected?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Under certain exceptions and limitations, and the President could control it.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is there any difference between the gentleman's bill and the Pittman bill, paragraph (b), section 4, aside from the exception giving the President discretion?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. There are two differences. The first difference is this: Under the Pittman bill when the President issues a proclamation that war exists that subsection (b) goes into effect automatically, while under the House bill conditions have to arise for the President to put it into effect.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. BEITER. The gentleman has ably described the difference between his bill and the Pittman bill, and has warned those who reside along the Great Lakes that if the Pittman bill were adopted it would paralyze commerce between this country and Canada. Is there any provision in either the Pittman bill or the House bill that would guard shipping interests using the Welland Canal? Of course, along the Great Lakes we have to use the Welland Canal to a great extent in shipping our merchandise to the ocean. Let us assume that Canada became involved in war; is there any protection to the shippers of this country who are compelled to use the Welland Canal in either bill?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. We have certain limitations and restrictions. If our ships or citizens would keep out of danger, then the President would exempt them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman was describing the provisions of the bill a few moments ago with respect to the license fee and the National Munitions Board, and he stated that the license fee, where the business done is less than $50,000, is $100. I notice on page 30, in line 14, the printer has omitted the figure after the dollar mark.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Thank you. We will have to correct that by amendment when we reach it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Referring to lines 14 and 15, on page 18, under "definitions", as I read this the Philippine Islands are included as a part of the United States in this bill.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. In view of the fact that the islands are in a transition period, will it not be necessary for us to change this bill when full and complete independence becomes operative?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. There is no question about that, and there may be lots of other things that will have to be changed, when we get to the future.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Take line 24, page 23, would that permit the solicitation of funds for the International Red Cross, although it is in behalf of the relief of the suffering?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not quite understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Line 24, page 23. If we permit the solicitation of funds for the International Red Cross or similar institutions, would not that in fact be aiding and abetting one or both sides of the war taking place?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It might be on both sides, and it might be on one side. We would relieve the suffering. We want to relieve all.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. In answering the gentleman from New York in relation to the discretionary power, if the Pittman bill were agreed to, it would be mandatory, and the President would have no discretion.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Absolutely. The gentleman is correct. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. Does not the gentleman think that with the passage of section 4 the nations of the world will realize that we are not going to carry any more foodstuffs in event of war, and they will discriminate against our agricultural markets and will trade with nations who will continue to trade with them when they are in their worst need?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I think the gentleman's suggestion is one well to be considered, and it is for that very reason that we are trying to save all we can by that exception limitation.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will say the gentleman's argument was very conclusive in giving the President the power, but I thought it went further and was almost an argument against the whole section.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. We are saving what we can.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. As I understand this bill, it gives the President of the United States discretionary power to place an embargo, not only upon what is now understood to be munitions of war, but likewise upon foodstuffs, clothing, and any other material or commodity that he deems necessary to place an embargo on, in order to save the security of the United States.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is mistaken. We do not place an embargo on materials of war. We place certain restrictions upon the way of selling materials. They can come here and get all that they want; but we do not place an embargo, unless you would consider that action an embargo.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Now, following that up, suppose two countries are engaged in war. If we supply foodstuffs, are we not getting on dangerous ground then, just the same as if we supplied munitions of war?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That depends. I do not know whether we would or not. It would depend on the conditions at the time. If I had my way, I would exempt foodstuffs and clothing.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. So would I.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I hope the President will never put them in there, but under the Pittman bill they will all be in there.

Mr. HAINES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. HAINES. The gentleman, in reply to an inquiry by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR], stated that they could come here and buy goods and take them away. The gentleman means they could take them away in their own ships; not in American bottoms?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They could in American vessels if orders were not made to the contrary by the President. The President would control that, as to where the ships were going.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. PACE. Do I understand in section 4 that the same articles are contemplated under (a) as under (b)?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They may be.

Mr. PACE. One says "certain articles and materials." I understand those are things suitable for war purposes.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. They are all the same articles. Section (b) provides that nothing shall be sold without title passes. Section (a) provides that the President can mention such commodities and refuse to let American vessels carry them.

Mr. PACE. Then what is the significance in section (a) of using the language "articles and materials"?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not think there is any significance. It was just drafted that way.

Mr. PACE. And in section (b) using the word "commodities."

Mr. McREYNOLDS. "Commodities" would cover "articles and materials." It is just a form of drafting that no one noticed at the time; but "commodities" would cover it. I presume that is my word, because I have used "commodities" more than the other. I think it is broader and covers the whole field.

Mr. PACE. Then (a) and (b) are to cover the same articles?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The same articles; yes.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In placing the gentleman's construction on this bill, to what extent do we surrender the right of freedom of the seas in placing this embargo on shipments and in refusing to permit our vessels to engage in that sort of commerce during war?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I would say that we are not relying on the freedom of the seas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. In other words, it does involve surrender?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Why, certainly, to a great extent. They did not pay any attention to the freedom of the seas during the World War, and I do not think they will pay any attention to it in the next war.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Is it possible to have any neutrality legislation, in the gentleman's opinion, without to some extent becoming isolationists insofar as the rest of the world is concerned?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I think we have done just about the best we could do, trying to save as much of the American goods and people's interests as possible, under this bill.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Then those two things I have mentioned are factors of sacrifice, necessary, that will be involved in the passage of any effective neutrality legislation?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MAHON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. MAHON of Texas. I know the gentleman from Tennessee is conversant with and, in fact, an authority on this subject. I should like to ask the gentleman if I understood the gentleman correctly a few moments ago when I understood him to say that if he had his way about it he would be of the opinion that we should not restrict the transportation of foodstuffs to belligerent nations?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I surely did say it.

Mr. MAHON of Texas. That, of course, is not in the bill?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. No. We could not get by with it, except the President could leave it out if he wants to under my bill.

Mr. DONDERO. Might not this bill be strengthened to overcome the objection that has been made by providing in it that we might still deal with the belligerent nations to the extent of shipping commodities in American vessels to the extent of the normal trade with those nations, we will say, over a 5-year period preceding hostilities between the nations?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That was the bill last session. When I introduced my bill this session it covered that plan, but it looked as though we were not going to get very far, that it would be difficult to enforce, that it would be doing more injustice to one than the other, so we abandoned it.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. The gentleman gave an excellent exposition of the bill and the differences between the House bill and the Senate bill. I am interested in one subject that I do not think has been discussed—that of existing treaties with foreign countries.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. We had some hearings on that, of course. We understood that there are no treaties that would be involved; but if they were, they would have to be rectified in the proper way. There is nothing in the bill about them, of course.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I would ask the gentleman this question, then, he probably being familiar with this phase of the matter: If we pass this bill, would it in any way abrogate any existing treaty?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It would not.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I know the gentleman has made an exhaustive study of this subject. I wish he would explain whether there have been any instances where a nation has become involved in a war between other belligerent nations on account of shipping purely foodstuffs or noncontraband articles to one of the belligerents, unless there was an effective blockade?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is taking in a little too much territory for me. I do not know whether there ever was such a war. I know, however, that it was on account of our shipments and the loss of human lives that caused us to become involved in the World War. Under the old international law, of course, we had the right to ship to neutrals those commodities and materials that were not contraband of war. They had the right to approach our ships, inspect them, and if they did not contain contraband, we were supposed to permit them to go on, but before the war progressed very far they got to blowing them up first and examining them afterwards.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman does not think that the neutrality act passed in the Seventy-fourth Congress supplemented by an act applying to civil wars in general would be sufficient to protect the country and keep it out of war?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I think there is a demand in this country for legislation of the type represented by the pending bill. Sometimes I doubt the policy of even enacting permanent neutrality legislation without some qualification, because conditions change so quickly and so vastly these days. I am sure that the ranking Republican member of our committee knows that we are a long ways off in this bill from what we started with 4 years ago. Methods of warfare change so rapidly that we cannot tell what is going to occur or how to keep out of war. We have just tried to do the best we could.

Mr. MOTT. Under some of the provisions of this bill is there not danger of unfairness to weak nations? For example, were Japan and China to become involved in war and this bill should become a law——

Mr. McREYNOLDS. And if the President should put it into effect, of course, Japan could come here and get goods.

Mr. MOTT. And China could not?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes; the gentleman is right; and in the case of the Atlantic, Great Britain could get supplies from us and some weaker nation could not.

Mr. MOTT. Is there any way of avoiding such a situation?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. No; not unless the nations involved are equal in strength.

Mr. MOTT. And the gentleman is of the opinion that it would be better to take the risk of doing this injustice?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. MOTT. I am asking for information, and I am sure the gentleman will give me what information he can.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am trying to be as frank as I can with the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I have read this bill only once. I think the committee has done a fine job in trying to solve some of the problems of the past. I am curious, however, to know what the chairman of the committee thinks about the proposition that under the provisions of this bill the President might absolutely abandon the principle we have insisted upon for over a century, of freedom of the seas; and whether such abandonment might not paralyze the foreign commerce of this country and even the domestic commerce of this country?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am very glad the gentleman asked that question. We are going a long way in this bill from the principle of freedom of the seas; but in the House bill we have some little hold left on that principle, whereas in the Senate bill we have not.

Mr. MAY. If we are, as a matter of fact, to abandon the doctrine of the freedom of the seas—and I may say right here that I am opposed to abandoning it at all——

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Let us not abandon it.

Mr. MAY. If we abandon it, or if the President should abandon it so far as products other than munitions of war are concerned, why all of this adequate preparation for war that we are making now?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I may say there is nothing in this bill that abandons the doctrine of freedom of the seas. Under the form in which this bill is written, we are not relying on the freedom of the seas.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 8 additional minutes.

The gentleman asked why we are making these great preparations. May I say to the Members of the House you can write whatever neutrality bills you please, you can keep your citizens out of the war zone, you can do all that and more, but if you do not have a big navy to tell these bullies where to get off, you will get into it. Therefore I am in favor of a big navy.

Mr. MAY. We have pending before the Committee on Military Affairs a bill that takes the profits out of war and we have had such distinguished leaders as Barney Baruch appear before the committee and testify with reference to his cash-and-carry policy. Of course, I can speak only for myself, but I think that adequate preparation for war is the surest guaranty of peace.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. The thing that worries me is whether or not we may be able to get some of our money back from the European countries that owe us debts, if we do not abandon the freedom of the seas.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Referring to the gentleman's statement on trade treaties, do I understand from his statement this law cannot really become effective without adjusting some of the trade treaties?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not think there are any treaties in the way, but if there are they would have to be adjusted.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Before this act could become effective?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. LUCAS. There was reference made to the fact that the administration might or might not be against this bill. Would the gentleman care to elaborate on that question?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. May I say in answer to the gentleman's question I am not authorized to say the administration is behind either bill, but I think I can show you that evidently the administration is not opposing this bill if we may take Acting Under Secretary of State, Mr. Moore's, statement when he appeared before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. I will read just a little of that statement:

Acting Under Secretary of State MOORE. There was a great deal of question in the hearings last year relative to flexibility in the legislation as against the mandate issued.

Quoting him further:

I think that the recent decision of the Supreme Court is a sort of a landmark in describing and defining the position in which the Executive is, and the power he has when he is handling our foreign affairs.

I am going to be very frank. I have always thought that legislation that is enacted should be permissive to a very large extent instead of being mandatory.

That point was argued at great length in the former hearings.

The Supreme Court of the United States rendered an opinion in the Chaco case, United States of America, appellant, against Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, and Mr. Justice Sutherland stated as follows:

It is important to bear in mind that we are here dealing not alone with an authority vested in the President by an exertion of the legislative power, but with such an authority plus the very delicate, plenary, and exclusive power of the President as the sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations—a power which does not require as a basis for its exercise an act of Congress; but which, of course, like every other governmental power, must be exercised in subordination to the applicable provisions of the Constitution. It is quite apparent that if in the maintenance of our international relations embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation, which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field, must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved.

That was the opinion he quoted. Then Mr. Moore goes on to say:

The Court goes on to say that this is true because he has a better opportunity of knowing the conditions, that he has confidential sources of information, has his agents abroad, and so on.

Then the Supreme Court cited the case in Two Hundred and Thirty-ninth United States Reports, the case of Mackenzie against Hare, which contained the following language:

As a government, the United States is invested with all the attributes of sovereignty. As it has the character of nationality it has the powers of nationality, especially those which concern relations and intercourse with other countries. We should hesitate long before limiting or embarrassing such powers.

That is the endorsement given by the Acting Under Secretary of State, Mr. Moore.

Mr. Chairman, we have undertaken to keep the State Department out of this, but that was their view as expressed at that time.

Let me read now what the President said at a previous time, and we have no reason to believe that he has changed his opinion. He made this statement when he signed the first joint resolution that was passed in reference to this matter.

On August 31, 1935, the President made the following statement on Senate Joint Resolution 173:

The latter section terminates at the end of February 1936. This section requires further and more complete consideration between now and that date. Here again the objective is wholly good. It is the policy of this Government to avoid being drawn into wars between other nations, but it is a fact that no Congress and no Executive can foresee all possible future situations. History is filled with unforeseeable situations that call for some flexibility of action. It is conceivable that situations may arise in which the wholly inflexible provisions of section I of this act might have exactly the opposite effect from that which was intended.

That pertains to the embargo on arms.

I could read further, but it will be noted what he thought about it at that time, and I have no reason to believe the President has changed his mind. If I did believe he had changed his mind, I would have asked him about the matter.

Mr. LUCAS. Is it true that Senator PITTMAN started out on practically the same theory as this bill, but was forced to change his course through the mandatory bloc that is on his committee?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It is quite evident there was a compromise in some way.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. I am not criticizing the giving of the power to the President, because the power has to be given to someone, but may I ask if thought was given to the conferring of a joint power to the President and the Secretary of State?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. It was not, because we know it will be joint, anyway, when they act. The President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. When he takes any steps in reference to foreign affairs the State Department is always consulted; in fact, it is always present.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. We do recall a controversy that arose between the President and the Secretary of State during the last war.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes; and he "resigned."

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Having that in mind, the thought occurs to me——

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I do not think it is necessary, because I believe as long as Franklin D. Roosevelt is President and Cordell Hull is Secretary of State they will agree. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to congratulate the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for his able presentation of his bill this afternoon.

I desire to congratulate the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the hard work and industry they have shown in formulating a so-called neutrality bill.

I furthermore desire to congratulate the House leadership for allowing 10 hours' debate on this very important subject involving the question of peace or war.

This is not exactly a neutrality measure. It is a quarantine bill. It is an effort to stay out of war. It is an attempt to promote peace. Parts of the bill are good, parts are bad, and other parts are indifferently good or bad. I hope we can keep the good, that we can do away with the bad, and that we can perhaps amend and perfect that which is indifferent and make it good. It is my hope that the House will legislate in a constructive manner and improve the bill so that most of the Members can conscientiously support it.

At the outset of my remarks I propose to appeal to the membership of the House to divest themselves of partisanship. Possibly it is an unworkable and impracticable appeal, one which will probably be disregarded, but I propose to make it just the same.

My appeal is that this bill should be considered on a strictly nonpartisan basis, that it shall be considered purely on its merits regardless of any partisanship at all. It is a peace measure and ought to be considered as such, transcending all party lines. I hope when it comes to the question of amendments the amendments will be considered purely on the basis of merit and not from a partisan viewpoint, and if that is done the Members of the House will write a bill that will do them credit.

I have commended the members of the committee for their diligence, but the fact is we did not hear from the Secretary of State at any time during the consideration of the bill. We did not even hear from the Under Secretary of State or any of the Assistant Secretaries of State. We did not hear from any great international lawyers or from any college professors on international law, or at least they did not appear before the committee.

The views of John Bassett Moore, probably the greatest living authority on international law, against the delegation of congressional powers to the President are in the minority report. We have presented Congress with an experiment, to my mind a very dangerous experiment.

I have a good deal of sympathy with the gentleman from Connecticut in his proposal that we should accept what is good and make it permanent law—possibly this is putting words in his mouth—by extending the present embargo law against arms, ammunition, and implements of war, prohibiting loans to belligerents, and then placing an extension of 1 year, at the most 2 years, on the rest of the unprecedented experiment.

When I say "experiment" I mean this delegation of the constitutional powers of the Congress to the President, authorizing him to lay embargoes, virtually to declare war, and to discriminate against American shipping.

If you insist on this bill without amendment—and we propose to offer amendments to do away with the unwarranted discretionary power to the President, and leave the power where it should be, in the hands of Congress—if the House rejects those amendments, then I hope there will be sufficient Members who will agree to a permanent embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war, with a year's limitation on the balance of the bill. The Congress should refuse to delegate permanently our constitutional power to lay embargoes and our constitutional power to declare war, and oppose placing this discriminatory power in the hands of the President to be used against our own American shipping. I doubt if we have the constitutional right to delegate away permanently the power invested in Congress to lay embargoes.

Before I go further I want to renew my appeal, even to the committee members. An unfortunate custom has grown up in this House. The committees have assumed to be the masters of the House. They have built up a veritable Frankenstein. They forget that they are the creatures of the House, the servants of the House, and not the masters. They report out legisaltion sometimes with limited or inadequate hearings and say to the House, "You must not amend that. You have no right to amend our bill." This practice is making for bad legislation, and the House ceases to be a legislative body.

Certainly, this particular bill should be considered as a nonpartisan measure on its merits, and even the committee members who reported it out so it could be considered before the House should favor beneficial amendments. This is the proper thing to do and the right procedure.

I voted against this bill in committee so I could write a minority report. I intended to file a minority report alone, but I submitted it one afternoon to four or five Republicans on the committee who happened to be in the House and they signed it. I did not submit it to any Democrats, and I did not care who signed it or who did not sign it. I wrote the minority report so that the Members of the House could read it if they wanted to, and I sincerely hope that they will before they vote on the amendments.

I reiterate my appeal to the members of the committee who voted out this bill, that they are not restrained in any sense from voting for any amendment that would improve the bill. They only voted the bill out of the committee so it would be before the House but with no reservations or commitments against perfecting amendments.

Furthermore, this bill has a somewhat different status from others, because there are really two neutrality bills. There is the Pittman bill, passed by the Senate, and this, the McReynolds bill. The committee, knowing about that situation, reported out this bill without extended hearings as the Senate bill had already passed, and the differences will be presumably ironed out in conference.

This is very far from a perfect bill. The House could write a bill, if it wanted to, that would probably be acceptable and a far better bill than either one of these.

My distinguished friend from Tennessee seemed to get very excited about the fact that somebody in the civil service or some civil-service union had the temerity to send a petition to the Congress of the United States either for or against certain neutrality legislation. Since when have civil-service employees ceased to be American citizens?

A civil-service employee has as much right as the gentleman from Tennessee either to favor or to oppose this legislation. I refer the gentleman to the first amendment of the Constitution, which states:

> Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peacefully to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

This is merely a matter of freedom of speech and of petition to the Congress. Of course, a civil-service employee, whoever he may be, has the same constitutional rights as any other citizen, and I cannot understand either the reasoning or the logic of the gentleman from Tennessee in taking umbrage at the fact that a civil-service employee or a union of them dared to write to the Congress about this bill. Have these civil-service employees all become rubber stamps? Is it a crime for an American citizen to express his judgment about legislation? I think these remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee are most unfortunate at the present time as it smacks too much of Hitlerism or fascism.

This is probably one of the most extraordinary bills that has ever come before the Congress, because it attempts to go two directions at the same time. I have been waiting to find out whether the President of the United States has endorsed this bill; I have been waiting to find out whether the Secretary of State dares to endorse this bill, because if they do they repudiate their own policies.

The Secretary of State says that the road to peace is through the extension of trade, more exports and more imports; and this bill states just the opposite, that the way to peace is not to sell and, probably, not to buy.

However, this is not all that is peculiar in this bill. I want to stand corrected if my Latin is wrong, but I say, "O tempora, O mores." Has it come to this, that the League of Nations has fallen so low and is so moribund that there is no one to do it reverence in the house of its friends? What is this measure? It is an isolationist measure, pure and simple, and the extraordinary thing about it is that the Senators, like Senators BORAH and JOHNSON, who led the fight against the League of Nations, and at that time were called irreconciliables and isolationists, are the very ones who are now opposing this bill because it is superisolationist. It goes even too far for them. It surrenders the freedom of the seas.

It surrenders our neutral rights on the high seas, permitting neutral ships to carry neutral goods or that free ships make free goods. They opposed this isolationist bill and yet the President of the United States who once ran on a platform favoring the League of Nations is alleged to favor it. Shades of Woodrow Wilson! This bill means the death of the League of Nations, killed by its own friends. This is the last nail in the coffin of the League of Nations—done to death by the very man who once urged it openly on the American people, including Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hull. I am not shedding tears. I have always been against it, but I am stating here an unquestioned fact.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. FISH. I yield, certainly.

Mr. LUCAS. Is it not a fact, however, that this bill, if enacted into law, partially does the same thing that the League of Nations attempted to do insofar as the peace of the universe is concerned?

Mr. FISH. I hope this bill, imperfect as it is, will have better effect in promoting the peace of the world than the League of Nations.

Mr. LUCAS. I am talking about the idea.

Mr. FISH. I do not know. I am not quite sure about the idea in this bill. I shall try to get to that in a minute. The bill pulls two ways and it is pretty hard to find an idea when it is running away from you. You have to catch it when it comes back, and that is the trouble I have with this bill because it is claimed to be a neutrality bill and it provides for unneutral acts that may drag us into war.

Let us take up first the good features of the bill. We proclaim a new doctrine and, certainly, an unselfish doctrine. We propose to sacrifice for all time the profit on arms, ammunition, and implements of warfare. We propose to make permanent our temporary law.

We are the only nation in the world that has ever taken any such step in the direction of peace, and we do it of our own accord. We are not compelled to do it, we are not forced to do it; and yet the American Congress will, I am sure, by a unanimous vote, declare this to be its policy, and a very proper policy, because no one in this country wants America to be the symbol of arms and munitions of war for the sake of greed and profit. If we are to have a war in the future it must be a war in defense of the United States of America and not a war in defense of the war profiteers and the munitions makers of America.

We propose in the name of peace and humanity to sacrifice war profits on arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent nations or those engaged in civil strife by unanimous vote of the Congress, regardless of party. It will then become the permanent American policy and a gratuitous contribution to world peace and to a war-weary world.

There are those who say that this is far enough and we should stop there. That is a fair argument, a very fair argument, because we are way ahead of the procession. Nobody else has done this, and no other nation is even thinking of doing it. Yet we have done it of our own accord and ask nothing in return.

The main objections of those of us on the committee to this bill who are opposing its bad features are simply these: Section 4 gives the President unwarranted and unnecessary discretionary power to lay embargoes. Section 4 is the main controversial part of the bill, and that is where the big contest will come. Section 4a gives the President the discretionary power to lay embargoes against what? Why, against American ships—not against foreign ships, not against neutral ships, but embargoes that discriminate against the American merchant marine. Congress, on the other hand, appropriates millions of dollars for our merchant marine every year.

Mr. SIROVICH. How does it discriminate?

Mr. FISH. It gives the President power to lay embargoes only against American shipping, against our ships that might carry certain products, cotton, oil, copper, steel, or even foodstuffs, but he has no power to lay embargoes against neutral or belligerent ships. The result is that Congress delegates its constitutional power to lay embargoes to one man and I do not care whether he is good, bad, or indifferent, Republican or Democrat, we place the power in the hands of one man to ruin and wreck the entire American merchant marine by such embargoes and sacrifice American interests without any control by Congress.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Does the gentleman mean to state that under the provisions of this bill the President would have to embargo or might embargo only American ships and that at the same time English merchant ships could come into our port and get the very goods and take them out, after the embargo on American ships?

Mr. FISH. That is precisely the situation. The gentleman has stated it correctly and clearly.

Mr. SIROVICH. Is not the embargo against the goods themselves in this country?

Mr. FISH. No; the embargo is against the American ships, and here we are spending millions of dollars to build up an American merchant marine. Of course I believe that we must look after American interests first, but this bill might just as well have been written in No. 10 Downing Street by the British Prime Minister, because it hands all the trade on the Atlantic over to the British Government and to the British merchant marine and discriminates against our own. On the other hand, as far as the Pacific is concerned, the bill might have been written by the Japanese Prime Minister, because it turns all the trade over to them in the Pacific and helps destroy our American merchant marine.

I say to you Members—and I am pointing at the Democrats, but I mean also the Republicans—and this is a constitutional power that belongs to us—if you vote to give this power to the President to destroy our shipping, then you Members who vote for it are accountable to your own people, and particularly those of you who live in the ports of the country—East, West, or South—and have a merchant marine to look after. That provision certainly should be considered and voted on in a nonpartisan way. It is not a question of democratic or republican policies, it is a question affecting the existence of our merchant marine, and American interests. Do we propose to sacrifice them to the British and the Japanese interests, and particularly to those interests and to those countries that still owe us huge war debts?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Concerning the statement the gentleman made a moment ago, and which I understand he is now discussing with reference to discrimination against American vessels in favor of other vessels, I understood him to say that the bill levies an embargo against American vessels, but does not levy an embargo against other vessels.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not say that. I said that the President is given discretionary power to lay embargoes against American ships, but not against others.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Let me analyze it.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman will have his time to speak, but that is the fact. I do not know how he is going to analyze it. That is written into the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I want to read a sentence to show that the gentleman's statement is either erroneous or I have misunderstood him. We have no power to regulate the shipment of other ships into belligerent territory. The section the gentleman refers to is not an embargo alone of departure of ships from our ports, but to carry goods into belligerent countries. We cannot control the ships of other countries carrying commodities into belligerent countries, but this gives the President power to prevent our ships from carrying commodities into belligerent countries.

Mr. FISH. I know the gentleman has tried to analyze it and make it mean something that he would like it to mean, but it does not mean that. Here is what it says:

> The President shall by proclamation from time to time definitely enumerate the articles and materials which it shall be unlawful for American vessels to transport.

That is clear English language. There is no mistake about that. That is the crux of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Here is the crux of the bill the gentleman is discussing, on page 21, line 7:

> For any American vessel to carry such articles or materials to any belligerent state.

We cannot control the ships of other countries carrying goods into belligerent countries, but we can control our own vessels.

Mr. FISH. We can write laws that will apply equally to American vessels, as far as the export of commodities is concerned.

We can say that foreign vessels cannot carry certain commodities, applying it equally to all. If we can say it to American ships we can say it to foreign ships or belligerent ships or neutral ships. That must be self-evident merely by restricting or restraining the commodities and not the ships.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman is not in favor of foreign vessels coming over here and buying goods and paying for them, although we put these other restrictions on?

Mr. FISH. Oh, I did not say anything about that. Please do not put words into my mouth. I am discussing one thing, and that is that American ships are discriminated against. I made no such statement and had no such thought as the gentleman suggests.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. For a question; yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The gentleman's objection, if it is a valid objection, would apply almost equally against the Pittman bill and the McReynolds bill, would it, or against one of them?

Mr. FISH. I am not sure of the exact wording of the Pittman bill. I am not very much alarmed either, because I imagine this will all go into conference, the Pittman bill and this bill, and will be straightened out, as far as those items are concerned, in conference.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. What does the gentleman think of the suggestion of amending this bill to read that we shall continue normal commercial trade with any two countries that may be at war, in American ships in time of war, as we did for 5 years previous to the time they went into war, in order to keep American ships on the high seas, only on commodities and materials that do not go into the manufacture of war materials?

Mr. FISH. I think that is proper and sound.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield for a question.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Do I understand the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] to mean that if we permitted a normal quota, you would have them go to the war zones and be delivered to belligerents?

Mr. DONDERO. I mean exactly this, the right to continue the same relations with two belligerent nations as we did in peacetime. In other words, continue normal relations.

Mr. FISH. If we could establish a war zone, in a future war, I would be in favor of keeping American ships out of that war zone; but I doubt very much whether we could establish a war zone. Probably in the next war the war zone will cover all the oceans, from one side to the other. If we could limit the war zone to 200 miles or 100 miles from the belligerent nations, I would be in favor of keeping out of those war zones, because of possible attacks by submarines, airplanes, mines, and so forth.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. I think what the gentleman has just said, that it would be impossible to establish a war zone, is the best speech in favor of neutrality that I know of.

Mr. FISH. I wish we could establish war zones, but I doubt it. However, I do not agree that American ships must keep off the sea. There are parts of this bill that I am in favor of. I am not against all of it. Nobody loathes or abhors war more than I do, and nobody will go to a greater extent to keep us out of war or to do away with or limit war as far as humanly possible.

Now, for the sake of educating Congress, including Republicans and Democrats, this question of neutrality is not anything new. It goes back to April 22, 1793, to that famous proclamation issued by George Washington. It is short, and it is so interesting and so modern that I propose to read it. George Washington had a great deal of vision. He seemed to foresee things. He foresaw the war that was brewing then between Great Britain and France, when he began to formulate his famous proclamation of neutrality. It might have been written today with the world filled with rumors of war. He wrote to Thomas Jefferson and his Cabinet about it a few weeks before war was declared. The proclamation reads:

APRIL 22, 1793.

By the President of the United States of America

A PROCLAMATION

Whereas it appears that a state of war exists between Austria, Prussia, Sardinia, Great Britain, and the United Netherlands, on the one part, and France, on the other, and the duty and interest of the United States require that they should with sincerity and good faith adopt and pursue a conduct friendly and impartial toward the belligerent powers:

I have therefore thought fit by these presents to declare the disposition of the United States to observe the conduct aforesaid toward those powers respectively; and to exhort and warn the citizens of the United States carefully to avoid all acts and proceedings whatsoever, which may in any manner tend to contravene such disposition.

And I do hereby also make known that whosoever of the citizens of the United States shall render himself liable to punishment or forfeiture under the law of nations, by committing, aiding, or abetting hostilities against any of the said powers, or by carrying to any of them those articles, which are deemed contraband by the modern usage of nations, will not receive the protection of the United States, against such punishment or forfeiture; and further, that I have given instructions to those officers, to whom it belongs, to cause prosecutions to be instituted against all persons, who shall, within the cognizance of the courts of the United States, violate the law of nations, with respect to the powers of war, or any of them.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

By the President,
THOMAS JEFFERSON.

That would almost apply today. That is the fundamental neutrality policy of the United States, that we should be neutral, friendly, and impartial to all nations.

How can we remain neutral when we give the President discretionary power? How can we remain neutral when we give the President the power to lay embargoes, let us say, on oil, as we do in this bill, against both nations, it is true? But let us assume that he had power and had applied it in the Ethiopian-Italian war. Then it would have been used only against Italy. It would have been an unneutral and unfriendly act; it would have been a hostile act; it would have been almost an act of war. Yet that is the power we are giving him, the power to declare any embargoes he wants on cotton, oil, coal, copper, wheat, and foodstuffs.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. MAY. What the gentleman means to say, I take it, is that because Italy has no oil to speak of that it would be a nonneutral act toward Italy.

Mr. FISH. An absolute discrimination against Italy; and that is the power he wanted at the time.

Mr. MAY. That, of course, would depend upon whether Ethiopia had plenty of oil.

Mr. FISH. Ethiopia did not need any oil. It would depend on other things with other nations; it might not be oil; it might be some other commodity. This policy is very apt to involve us in war, in my judgment. If the President has certain things in mind, let him enumerate a list of commodities and send the list to Congress and let Congress decide whether they want to take the risk of war. We represent the people. The people have more at stake than anybody else; they have the lives of their sons. We should not surrender our constitutional power to declare war to any one man; and no one man should ask for it.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BIERMANN. I understood the gentleman to say a little while ago that this bill gives the President the power to declare war. I suppose the gentleman does not mean that that power is specifically set out in the bill.

Mr. FISH. Not literally, not specifically; no.

Mr. BIERMANN. To what did the gentleman refer?

Mr. FISH. The bill is sufficiently broad to give the President discretionary power to lay embargoes on commodities—against both belligerents, it is true, although one might need the commodity and the other not. Laying such an embargo is an unneutral act, an unfriendly act; it is an act that might involve us in war and undoubtedly would involve us in war.

I want to make a further appeal to the Democrats to consider these matters on a nonpartisan basis; and although I realize that I am not always nonpartisan in my remarks, I think I have a record of being 100 percent nonpartisan in my remarks on questions of war and peace.

A few years ago Secretary Stimson, a Republican Secretary of State under a Republican administration, asked the Committee on Foreign Affairs for the power to determine the aggressor nation. This is an unneutral act, an unfriendly act, an act which undoubtedly would mean war.

For instance, if the President had that power and said that Japan was an aggressor nation against China and then we refused to sell any arms or munitions to Japan but would sell to China and an American ship flying an American flag proceeded from New York to Shanghai with contraband of war, naturally a Japanese destroyer would seize our vessel outside the Chinese port. Our honor would be impugned, our dignity would be slighted, and probably we would be involved in war within 30 days. I opposed granting that power to my own administration, and I am proud to say that not a single Republican member of the Foreign Affairs Committee voted for it, although the Secretary of State came down and pleaded and pleaded, and even went to my floor leader and told him what he thought of me; but my floor leader backed me up and said that the Committee on Foreign Affairs could handle their own affairs.

So a few years ago, when President Roosevelt sent Secretary Hull to our committee asking for identically the same power, I opposed that, because it is not an act of peace; it is an act of war. This discretionary bill tends in that direction, although it does not go quite that far. It gives discretionary power to the President supposed to be used only against both warring nations, but actually is used against one nation, and thus discriminates against that nation. That nation will resent it, and there will be enmity and hostility which will eventuate in war.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman is the ranking minority member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Does he join with the chairman of the committee as he expressed himself today, neither approving or disapproving the embargo on foodstuffs?

Mr. FISH. I am glad the gentleman asked that question, because I was going to take it up in a few minutes. The reason I propose that we make a permanent embargo on arms, munitions, and implements of war is because we are all agreed on that. The rest of the bill, however, is pure experiment. We have had very little in the way of committee hearings. We have not even heard from the State Department although we asked them to be there—I mean the Secretary of State and Under Secretaries of State. I do not mean the subordinates.

Whether the administration be Republican or Democratic, it is not the President who uses the power, nor is it the Secretary of State, but it is the subordinates who like to have their fingers in every foreign pie—and they do not always pull out plums; they are just as apt to involve us in war.

Now, let me get the gentleman's question again.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I referred to an embargo on foodstuffs.

Mr. FISH. This is a very, very important part of any neutrality policy, although it is ignored in the pending bill. I propose to make permanent the prohibition against the sale and shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war, but placing a 1-year limitation on the rest of the bill.

Possibly you Democrats will not follow me, but I am willing to go along with the untried experiments for 1 year and in the meanwhile ask the President to call an international conference of all the 63 signatory nations to the Briand-Kellogg Pact, which renounces war as an instrument of national policy, and try to implement that pact not by force or coercion but by considering the rights of the neutrals on the high seas. The main thing to consider in connection therewith is the question of the rights of neutrals to carry foodstuffs. I for one believe that Great Britain, Germany, and other nations would agree to that right in future warfares. I think that would be the greatest step toward peace that we could accomplish. It would do far more good than this experiment we are considering and would put an end to starving women and children in belligerent nations.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. As I understand the gentleman's statement, he would ask for a 1-year limitation, and I presume that would be on everything except what is provided in the present law?

Mr. FISH. Everything except the present law.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. And he would make that permanent?

Mr. FISH. That is what I want to do. Of course, I am going to try to change the discretionary powers granted to the President. If you vote that down, well and good. Then I shall be in favor of putting a 1-year limitation on certain sections of this bill, but I want to reserve my right to at least carry out my own principle, and that is not to delegate any constitutional powers to the President to lay embargoes or to involve us in a war.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. The gentleman has stated that had we embargoed oil and cotton during the Italo-Ethiopian War, that would have been an unfriendly act toward Italy?

Mr. FISH. Exactly.

Mr. HEALEY. I agree with the gentleman. Is that merely because we had changed our neutrality during that warfare between those two nations?

Mr. FISH. Yes. This bill proposes that the act of the President shall take place during a war. We give him the discretionary power to use in time of war, and that is what makes it so much worse. It is applied only during wartime and involves embargoes only during a war. That is the time the discretion is used.

Mr. Chairman, there is another amendment I should like to have considered. If we are to outlaw, as we properly should, the sale of ammunition, arms, and implements of war in time of war to belligerents, why not outlaw the sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war in time of peace as well as in time of war? [Applause.] Why go chasing after this blood money for the sake of greed and profit and the promotion of war? Why arm other nations who already owe us a great deal of money? It is only consistent that we apply the embargo to peace as well as to war. We have outlawed war. We have renounced it as an instrument of national policy except for defense under the Kellogg Pact. Why should we not outlaw the shipment of munitions of war in time of peace as well as in time of war? I propose to offer such an amendment, and you can vote it up or down.

Mr. KLOEB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KLOEB. When we get away from the extraordinary war powers as conferred by the Constitution, how could we constitutionally enact such a provision?

Mr. FISH. To prohibit the shipment of arms abroad?

Mr. KLOEB. The sale and shipment of arms.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is getting me into a constitutional question. I will leave that for the Supreme Court.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Let us assume the policy the gentleman has just suggested had been the policy of France at the time of the Revolutionary War. Does the gentleman believe we would have gained our independence?

Mr. FISH. Certainly not; but that was over 150 years ago. We have gone forward since then.

Mr. CULKIN. But we would never have been born.

Mr. FISH. I do not propose that this country should be the symbol of arms and munitions of war in order to help somebody else promote a war. The time to stop war is in time of peace.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman recognizes if that had been the law of France at that time then America would never have been born, and the gentleman would not be here.

Mr. FISH. Yes; but France was practically at war with England. And I recognize that American public opinion today has decided against the sale and shipment of arms, and I for one am willing to make very large concessions and surrender a large part of our freedom of the seas, because, if you analyze the principle of the freedom of the seas, you will find it has involved us in every single foreign war in the last 150 years with one exception, the Crimean War. It involved us in a limited war with France in 1798 to 1800. It involved us in the War of 1812 and in the World War, because we insisted on our neutral right to sell arms and everything else to belligerent nations. That is what the freedom of the seas is. We propose to change that. We propose to partially surrender it, not because someone demands it, but because we want to do it for our own sake and for the best interest of the American people.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I wonder if we will have any more success in procuring peace by abandoning the freedom of the seas than we had when we destroyed about $200,000,000 worth of vessels right after the World War. We sank them to the bottom of the sea to bring about world peace.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman has a very good right to think that. Nobody believes that this bill is a guarantee against war. Nobody even claims it. Most of us believe it is a rather dangerous experiment upon which we are embarking, particularly when we empower the President to discriminate against American ships and empower him possibly to get us into war by use of discretionary embargoes. Those two things ought to be stricken out.

However, there is a great deal more in the bill that is good: Prohibiting the lending of money to belligerent nations and prohibiting submarines coming into our harbors, which ought to be made mandatory instead of discretionary. This bill is a purely discretionary bill all the way through, and all these powers should be retained by Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The provision with reference to prohibiting loans of money is mandatory.

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. This makes it permanent law and makes it mandatory.

Mr. FISH. Everybody is for that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I thought the gentleman said that was——

Mr. FISH. No; I am talking about the submarines, another provision of the bill.

However, every section in this bill is discretionary. At the proper time we will offer amendments, just as we will on this question of submarines. It ought to be mandatory to keep these submarines out and not let the President have this discretion, for if he keeps them out after war is begun, then the nation against which he acts will think it is another unfriendly gesture.

We are discussing here a so-called neutrality bill. This is not a neutrality bill as far as the discretionary powers are concerned; it is an unneutrality bill. However, it is an attempt to stay out of war and has good parts and good intentions. We are discussing the whole policy of peace and war.

As far as existing international law is concerned, it is merely what the British Empire concedes to the neutral nations. Therefore, we need not discuss the question of the freedom of the seas. Great Britain dominates the seas. She tells the neutrals where they get off. They did that in the last war and they will do it in the next.

However, this being a question of peace and war, I propose to use some of my time to digress a little bit in order to read to the House a letter which I received at 6 o'clock last night from the Secretary of State with respect to the war debts. These war debts are involved in this entire situation. Great Britain owes us $5,000,000,000. I forgot a billion when I was speaking the other day. It is a little over five billion. But what is a billion among friends? [Laughter.]

One of the questions I asked in my letter was, "What protest have we made to Great Britain in regard to its proposed huge naval armament, to the extent of seven and one-half billions of dollars?"

As I figure it out, they owe us 75 percent of the amount they are proposing to spend on military and naval armament. They owe us $5,000,000,000, and they are spending $7,500,000,000 on armament. Therefore we have at least a 50-percent interest in all the new British battleships. We might get them to protect our American ships if we are afraid to do it ourselves.

It is an amazing thing, when you look at the sums involved in the war debts, to find that the total indebtedness as of January 15, 1937, of three nations was $11,000,000,000, and of all the others approximately one billion. Yet those three nations are the ones which are arming to the teeth, who have gone stark, staring mad, and are spending money as fast as they can to build up big armament.

France owes us, as of January 15, 1937, $4,081,000,000; Great Britain, $5,107,000,000; and Italy, $2,017,000,000.

France has made no payments whatever since this administration came into power. Italy has paid $2,000,000—give her credit for that—and Great Britain has paid $17,000,000. That is all we have received on these war debts in the last 4 years, $19,000,000, about one-third the cost of a battleship.

The letter from the Secretary of State is dated March 11, 1937:

MY DEAR MR. FISH: I transmit the following information which you requested in six numbered questions in your letter of January 26, 1937:

"(1) What war-debt payments have been made since March 4, 1933, by each nation in accordance with the official debt-funding settlements or agreements entered into?"

I enclose a memorandum prepared in the Treasury Department, and revised January 15, 1937, covering the indebtedness of foreign governments to the United States. Pages 32 and 33 give an itemized statement of payments made during the period from July 1, 1932, to January 15, 1937, under the funding agreements and moratorium agreements. Pages 34 to 37 give an itemized statement of the amounts due under the funding and moratorium agreements and not paid as of January 15, 1937—

I have already given you the figures on what has been paid—

"(2) What steps have been taken to induce Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, or any other defaulting nations to fulfill their obligations in accordance with terms and provisions of the World War debt-funding agreements approved by the Congress?"

As amounts scheduled to be paid annually or semiannually under funding and moratorium agreements become due and payable, this Government, shortly before the due date, transmits to each debtor government a statement of the amounts due and payable on the said due date, together with a statement of amounts previously due and unpaid. In preparing this notice of amounts due under the agreements signed by the debtor governments, it is the practice of this Government to add that it is fully disposed to discuss, through diplomatic channels, any proposals which the debtor government may desire to put forward in regard to the payment of the indebtedness and to give such proposals careful consideration with a view to eventual submission to the American Congress.

Such notices and the replies of the respective debtor governments are customarily issued to the press and have also been republished in annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. With a few minor exceptions, this published correspondence comprises the formal communications exchanged with foreign governments regarding their indebtedness to the United States. Through such correspondence debtor governments have continued to acknowledge their indebtedness although they have not been prepared to resume payments or to submit any proposals for payment which might be considered with a view to submittal to the Congress. In addition to this formal correspondence, there is, of course, frequent mention of the subject of debts in informal diplomatic intercourse with the general objective of securing payment, but no representatives of this Government have been authorized to negotiate in any way with the debtors—

But actually nothing has been done—

"(3) What, if any, verbal or written understanding, assurance, or agreement has been entered into by the present administration offering to accept a reduction in the payment of principal or interest, or both, on any of the war debts since the joint resolution adopted by the Congress, approved December 23, 1931, expressly declaring against further reduction or cancelation of war debts?"

There has been no understanding, assurance, or agreement entered into by the present administration offering to accept a reduction in the payment of principal or interest, or both, on any of the war debts. Several payments in amounts less than those contractually due have been received from debtor governments, but in the correspondence pertaining to such payments the rights of the United States have always been reserved. Thus in a note addressed to the British Ambassador June 14, 1933, regarding a partial payment, the Acting Secretary of State said. (See Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury for year ended June 30, 1933, p. 246.)

"The President points out to His Majesty's Government the well-known fact that it is not within his discretion to reduce or cancel the existing debt owed to the United States, nor is it within his power as President to alter the schedule of debt payments contained in the existing settlement. Such power rests with the Congress."

"(4) What, if any, verbal or written assurances have been given or negotiations entered into by the present administration with any foreign nation regarding tariff concessions or trade agreements in respect to war-debt payments?"

Section 3 of the Trade Agreements Act of 1934, approved June 12, 1934, provides as follows:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed to give any authority to cancel or reduce, in any manner, and of the indebtedness of any foreign country to the United States."

There are no provisions in any trade agreement entered into under the authority of the act in regard to intergovernmental debts or payments thereon nor have any verbal or other assurances been given or negotiations entered into by the present administration with any foreign nation regarding tariff concessions or trade agreements in respect to war-debt payments. The trade agreements are designed to produce mutual economic benefit on their own basis.

"(5) What, if any, protest has been made to the governments of the debt-defaulting nations regarding the enormous increase of expenditures for military and naval armaments?"

No formal protests have been made to foreign governments regarding the increase of expenditures for military and naval armaments. As you know, the United States has taken a leading part in efforts to secure the limitation and reduction of armaments by international agreement.

I do know that the United States has taken that position, but I did not know that this administration had taken any such position. The United States did take such a position in 1922, when it called the Limitation of Armament Conference at Washington. They saved exactly $250,000,000 a year on their naval program, or a total of $4,000,000,000 in 16 years.

I know that it was extended in 1930 at the London Conference, through the 5–5–3 ratio, to smaller ships. But under this administration there has been nothing but failure, so today we are launched on this gigantic naval program and competition that breeds suspicion, distrust, hatred, and causes war.

If we do not propose to make some effort to collect these debts, if these nations are going to continue to refuse to pay us even the interest on the money we lent them after the Armistice, and if we are not going to protest these enormous armaments that are being built by Great Britain, France, and Italy, then let us make some bargain with the British to have a share in these new British battleships. We might get 51 percent of these battleships, and if we could do this, we might save a little something on our own program.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. Cannot the gentleman see a vast difference between these foreign countries paying the debts due this country and rearming themselves? In the latter case they are spending the money within their own countries, it is their own credit that is used in buying their own iron and building their own ships. If they undertook to pay us they would have to pay us in gold or in goods. We do not want the goods and they have not the gold.

Mr. FISH. Let me answer the gentleman.

Mr. PIERCE. I should like to have an honest answer from the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. Let me answer the gentleman specifically, because that is the old cry we always hear. Here is Great Britain appropriating seven and a half billion dollars—and the Chancellor of the Exchequer states it will amount to $10,000,000,000 before they get through—during the next 5 years, and at the same time they owe us $5,000,000,000.

Mr. PIERCE. How can they pay us?

Mr. FISH. Wait—do not be impatient.

Mr. PIERCE. Tell us how, please—in goods?

Mr. FISH. I will tell the gentleman. They owe us $5,000,000,000. They do not even pay us the interest on it. If they want to pay it, I will tell the gentleman exactly how they can pay it and pay it very easily. They can pay us in tin. They can send us $100,000,000 worth of tin each year. They can pay us in tea. They can also send us $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 worth of rubber. They could pay off the entire $5,000,000,000 in these three commodities alone without sacrificing a single American interest, and there are other commodities also; and if they want to surrender a few of their islands in the Caribbean Sea or in the West Indies, they could do that; but did you ever hear of Great Britain ever giving up anything? [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. IMHOFF). Without objection, the gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 additional minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one further question? Is it not true that if Great Britain undertook to pay the debt in the products the gentleman has referred to, this would dislocate the entire foreign business of Great Britain?

Mr. FISH. Certainly not. They have a complete monopoly on them, and they can control the situation absolutely with respect to tea, rubber, and tin.

Mr. MAY. And manganese.

Mr. FISH. There are other commodities, but these are the big ones, and they could pay off the debt in these products alone, and yet we make no protest. It might be different with some of the other debtor nations; but, in all sincerity, let me say that I would like to see a new debt-funding commission established. I am against the cancelation of the debts, and I am against the settlement of the debts by payment of 5 or 10 percent on them. I would rather have them owe us the money so we will never lend them any more than have them pay us 5 or 10 cents on the dollar; but so far as Great Britain is concerned, I think we drove a rather harsh bargain. We asked 80 percent of her and only 50 percent of France, and 25 percent of Italy; and I would be perfectly willing to reduce that 80 percent to 50 percent if they would show any signs of paying.

However, I would not be willing to reduce it to 5 or 10 percent, because I think it is good insurance at the present time and will keep us from being suckers and giving other billions of dollars to these foreign nations for purposes of war or the manufacture of armaments. [Applause.]

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a short question?

Mr. FISH. All right; go ahead.

Mr. HOOK. Will the gentleman tell us whether he has any plan by which a judgment could be entered against the debtor nations, and if such a judgment could be entered, what plan he may have for the collection of such judgment?

Mr. FISH. There is only one way to collect such a debt, and that is just the way you collect a personal debt. When someone owes you money and cannot pay it all, you meet with him and find out how much you can get from the debtor. The creditor and the debtor sit around a table, and that is the way it should be done in this case, and not take a token payment of 5 or 10 cents on a dollar. We know how much Great Britain can pay. We know what she is doing in the way of armament. We know in what commodities she can pay us. We are willing, or at least some of us are willing, to make it 50 percent instead of 80 percent, and we would then be getting two and a half billion dollars, which would help us to balance the Budget. And do not make any mistake about this matter of balancing the Budget. The Coolidge economy program would have been a myth without the Limitation of Armament Conference in Washington in 1922, when we saved $250,000,000 a year for 16 years.

Mr. HOOK. Is it not a fact that the best method to follow when you are dealing with a person of that kind who does not pay his debts, is not to have any further dealings with him until he does pay?

Mr. FISH. That may be the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDS. What does the gentleman from New York propose if our debtor friends will not pay us anything? What would the gentleman propose then?

Mr. FISH. That is what they are doing now. [Laughter.]

Mr. RICHARDS. What does the gentleman propose we should do?

Mr. FISH. We have not secured one penny, outside of Finland, from any of these countries, with the exception of the few million dollars I just spoke about.

Mr. RICHARDS. Then, how are we going to collect anything?

Mr. FISH. There is only one way to collect anything and that is to have a debt funding commission and ask these nations to meet with us and we can at least protest against their costly armament program and say, "If you are going to spend seven and a half or ten billion dollars in the next 5 years, it is about time you considered paying your just debts."

Yet you find the Chancelor of the Exchequer getting up and saying the finances of Great Britain are the envy of the world. Of course they are the envy of the world, when they refuse to pay their debts.

Mr. RICHARDS. But suppose this did not work?

Mr. FISH. Oh, I know what the gentleman wants me to say. He wants me to say, go to war. Of course we will not go to war; but sooner or later an administration will come into power that will make a demand on these nations and say, "When are you going to pay these debts; what are you going to do about them?"

That is what should be done now and, as a matter of fact, with another world war coming on, some action should be taken at once. That is what we are here for today. We are legislating against another world war. The world is filled with rumors and predictions are freely made that there will be another world war next year.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman seems to be very well informed, but does he remember from history how Andrew Jackson managed to collect some debts?

Mr. FISH. Yes; and that was after 30 years of dodging and delay by France. But you had in the White House then a man of courage, who spoke right out to these foreign nations, and told them exactly what he believed, not one that remained quiescent and complacent and did not raise his finger after he had made definite promises and pledges that the settlement of the war debts would be the first objective of his administration. He has done nothing about it during the last 4 years.

Mr. MAY. Did not Andrew Jackson hitch their boats to the shore and make them pay before they were let loose?

Mr. FISH. He made threats of reprisals. He told them what he meant in no uncertain terms.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. My friend has gotten rather far afield from the subject we are considering.

Mr. FISH. Very.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He admitted that he was sometimes partisan.

Mr. FISH. I am partisan in this matter of debts, but not on neutrality.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He has talked about the failure of this administration to collect the debts. I would like to ask the gentleman if it was not under the Hoover administration that the moratorium was instituted?

Mr. FISH. Certainly, by the consent of all of the Democrats in Congress and the Democratic leaders, but I do not want to get into any partisan discussion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Did the gentleman vote for the Hoover moratorium?

Mr. FISH. The question now is, What is the peace policy of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Did the gentleman vote for the Hoover moratorium?

Mr. FISH. I do not yield any further. I suppose the gentleman did.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. No, I did not.

Mr. FISH. Then the gentleman probably was not here. All of his leaders did. What is the policy of the United States, what is its peace policy? We are making an attempt to establish a peace policy today. Is it going to be a question of giving the President unwarranted and excessive discretionary powers? It seems to me the American people have already made up their minds what the policy should be, and that is this: If these old nations of the world propose to arm to the teeth and go to war, it is their war and not our war.

That is our policy, whether we are Republicans or Democrats, and the way to stay out of war is not to just pass scraps of paper like this or indulge in untried experiments. It may do some good, and it may do some harm, whether we vote for it or not. There is only one way to stay out of war and that is for the American people back home to make up their minds that they do not propose to be involved in any of these ancient blood feuds and boundary disputes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Oh, I know what the gentleman is going to say in advance, and I agree with him. He wants to let the people decide on whether we should go to war or not by a referendum, and the gentleman is probably correct. That would be a deterrent.

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman has correctly read my mind. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISH. So let us not get too enthusiastic that this bill is any guaranty for peace. The main guaranties are the people back home and their determination to stay out of war. If they want to keep out of war, we will keep out of war. If they want to go to war, then we will go into war, and the way to oppose war is to preach the gospel of peace and expose the horrors of war and show what is going on in Spain today, where brothers are murdering brothers, and let us remember that in this country we are ruled by a free ballot under free institutions and still have a free government; that the people still rule, and not as they do in Spain, where they have a government by the bullet, assassination, murder, and destruction on both sides.

That is the only answer, and meanwhile I conclude by making my final appeal, and that is when the amendments are introduced they be considered and voted on, on a nonpartisan basis, on the merits of each individual amendment. [Applause.]

The following is the conclusion of Secretary Hull's letter:

(6) What, if any, action has been taken by the present administration to collect the war debts from the Soviet Government which were loaned to the Kerensky Government, and to persuade the Soviet Government to reimburse American nationals for property confiscated by the Soviets; in accordance with agreement entered into between President Roosevelt and Commissar Litvinoff conditional to recognition of the U. S. S. R.?

From February 1934 to January 1935 negotiations were carried on with the Soviet Government in an endeavor to obtain a settlement of the claims of the Government of the United States and American nationals against the Soviet Government in accordance with the understanding arrived at between the President and the People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Soviet Union in November 1933, prior to the establishment of diplomatic relations. There is enclosed, for your information, the text of a statement made by the Secretary of State on January 31, 1935, which fully explains the situation as of that date. Since that date the subject has been from time to time mentioned to the Soviet Ambassador without any prospect of a settlement being reached which would be in any sense satisfactory to this Government. There has been the utmost diligence employed in the effort to bring about a settlement and it goes without saying that this Government has not relinquished the claims of the United States and of American nationals and continues to affirm the liability of the Soviet Government.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, by authority of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KLOEB].

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, and members of the Committee, now that we have listened to a thorough discussion of the relative merits and demerits of Democrats and Republicans, now that we have listened to a thorough discussion of war debts and of the question of disarmament and rearmament, I shall try to direct the minds of the Committee to the business in hand, which is a discussion of the Neutrality Act of 1937. Unlike my good friend from New York [Mr. FISH], but like the old friend of my childhood, William Shakespeare:

I have neither wit, nor words, nor worth,
Nor the power of speech,
To stir men's blood; I only speak right on;
I tell you that which you yourselves do know,
Show you sweet Caesar's wounds, poor, poor dumb mouths,
And bid them speak for me.

Those of us who have attended the daily hearings in the formulation of this bill feel that we have presented to you a good measure. I am sure that when you realize the work your committee has done you will conclude likewise.

Now, what is this whole question of neutrality? From back in the days of early civilization in the Valley of the Nile, down to the late Middle Ages, there was no such thing as a neutral state. Every state was on one side of a conflict or it was on the other side. In 1625 Hugo Grotius propounded this initial theory of a neutral state. He said it was the duty of a state not participating in the war to do nothing to assist the powerful aggressor and to refrain from doing that which would impede the lesser one. So neutrality ideas progressed until the enactment of the Jefferson embargoes.

On this question of war we have always had, in peace or in war, so-called outlaw nations. Always we have had nations that have refused to conform to the ideas of the family of nations, and we term them "outlaw nations." Why do they exist and why did they exist? They exist on the globe today in three potential spots. Why? Because there is lack of territory for the population pressure within that particular country, and there is lack of raw materials wherewith that country may pursue its daily tasks, and until the "have" countries of the world conclude that they must voluntarily share with the "have nots" some of their territory for colonization and for use of raw materials, we shall have this threat of war. That is getting at the root of the problem, and that is getting at the reason for war.

I have discerned in recent months a tendency upon the part of certain "have" nations to want to share with the "have not" nations in order to avert another world conflict. To my mind, in recent months the probability of another great conflict, imminent a few months ago, has been diverted possibly for some years to come.

BUT TO GET BACK TO THE JEFFERSON EMBARGOES

Back in the time of Thomas Jefferson we enacted the so-called "Jefferson embargoes." They were so drastic in their provisions, so drastic as to cause public indignation to become aroused immediately the act became applicable, and by public nullification and within 15 months by congressional act the law was nullified.

I do not want to see nullification happen in connection with the neutrality legislation that we are now considering. When I listened to the argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] in the few short moments that he directed to this bill, and which he directed to section 4 of the House bill, which is the commodity section, I analyzed his argument in this manner:

Either we assume the position of isolationists and go back to the Jefferson embargoes, or we proceed under international law, as we did prior to our entry into the World War, and sell to whom whatever we please. That, in effect and in short, was the philosophy of the gentleman from New York in his attack upon section 4 of the McReynolds bill. But believe me when I say that much as he may fuss and fume against that particular section, when the roll is called, do not be fooled, he will be found there. He will be found voting for the bill.

Now, how does the McReynolds bill differ from the so-called Senate bill, or Pittman bill? It seems to me that is the sole question before us. The present neutrality law, which has been in effect now for approximately 1 year, provides for three distinct matters:

First, mandatory—I prefer to use the word "automatic"—mandatory, automatic embargo upon the sale and shipment of munitions of war.

Second, mandatory, automatic, prohibition of loans and credits to warring nations.

Third, a prohibition against American citizens traveling on belligerent vessels, save at their own risk.

The present bill before us, the McReynolds bill, provides for those three things as its cardinal principles, except that as regards travel on ships of belligerent nations, it does not say that they shall travel at their own risk. It says that they shall not travel at all. Those three provisions of the present law are written into this bill which we are now considering. Personally, I would be satisfied with the extension and making permanent of the present law. However, there seems to be a demand throughout the country to attack the question of commodities. We have sought, therefore, to attack it in a way best fitted to accommodate the conditions and circumstances under which a future war may be fought, instead of by the so-called Pittman method, placing this country in a straightjacket, and measuring a future war by our experience in the past World War.

The only substantial difference between the House bill and the Pittman bill is contained in section 4 (b) of the House bill, which is section 2 (b) of the Pittman bill. You have both of those sections in the draft before you. Now, what is that difference? The section in the Senate bill provides that immediately, automatically upon the outbreak of a war, title to all articles and goods shipped from the United States to any of the belligerent countries shall be transferred to the foreign country, or its agent, as the consignee. The language of the so-called McReynolds or House bill reads in effect that after the outbreak of war, and when the President finds that the peace and safety and the neutral position of the United States is threatened, under such conditions and circumstances as he shall designate, we shall require that the title to articles, goods, and materials shall be transferred; and when I speak of materials I mean all materials other than actual munitions of war, because their sale and export are positively prohibited under section 3 of the McReynolds bill, which is section 1 of the so-called Pittman bill.

An analysis of both the McReynolds bill and the Pittman bill discloses this as the only substantial difference between them; and this is the decision that you and I as Members of this body must make within the next few days. The so-called Pittman bill paraphrased somewhat would read as follows—and I want you Members who represent districts in States contiguous to the Great Lakes, you Members who represent States on the Pacific coast and States on the Atlantic coast to listen carefully to what I have to say. Let us read section 2 (b) of the Pittman bill as found on page 5 of the draft before you.

Line 8:

> It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country or to any country wherein civil strife exists—> any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government.

Suppose you live in Detroit, Mich., and want to cross the river to Windsor, Canada. Let us suppose that Great Britain has declared war against Siam, or against Switzerland. Her dependents, parts of the British Empire, join technically, we will say, the mother country, although they are not actually at war in doing so. You desire to cross the river from Detroit to Windsor. We will say you want to take little Chester along and little Chester desires to take his velocipede. Under the terms of the Pittman bill automatically it is declared unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country or to any country wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government. The only condition under which little Chester may cross the river with his velocipede will be that he transfer title to his velocipede to the Canadian Government. If he does not do that, according to the provisions of the Pittman bill appearing on page 17, little Chester will have his velocipede confiscated, will pay a fine of $10,000, and will serve up to 5 years in some good prison of the United States. Witch burners of Salem! Why, my friends, what could be more severe? How far have we traveled with this theory of neutrality when we allow ourselves to be so prejudiced, when we allow our minds to drive us so far as to threaten to jail a boy for transporting a velocipede, or a little girl for transporting her doll baby across the border, if he or she has not first transferred title to some foreign government?

Under this section 2 (b) of the Pittman bill, you folks on the Pacific coast could not ship your goods from Seattle to Vancouver without first transferring title. You could not ship goods from San Francisco to Australia without first transferring title. You could not ship goods from Boston to Jamaica or Bermuda without first transferring title, if Great Britain were at war.

Why? You say because the Swiss Navy might sink our ships. You say that the Navy of Siam might sink our ships. That is not the case. The sole test that we can and must apply when we consider the application of any of these so-called remedies is this: Will the peace and safety and neutral position of the United States be threatened if this particular provision is not invoked? If the peace and safety of the United States is not threatened, or if the neutral position of the United States cannot be enhanced and strengthened by the application of one of these provisions, then far better that it be suspended and not invoked at all. Hence, my argument and the argument of my committee is to give to the Government certain broad powers: The power to order, if you please, the transfer of title if conditions demand it; the power, if you please, to order American ships to cease carrying certain materials used in the conduct of war if conditions demand it; but if conditions do not demand it and great maritime powers are not locked in death grip, why sacrifice the trade of the United States built up over years of effort, in order to carry through a hidebound theory that can only work to the detriment of these United States? This, my friends, in effect, is the sole difference between the McReynolds bill and the Pittman bill.

Let me point out to you what mischief the Pittman bill might work if we were to pass it and send it to the President. A few years ago when the Smoot-Hawley tariff law was being discussed in the very well of the House in which I now stand, warnings were sent out that retaliatory laws would be passed by other nations. We did not heed those warnings, and within 12 months 31 nations of the earth had passed retaliatory laws and had instituted import quotas, destroying overnight the great foreign export trade that we had taken pains to build up through many, many generations. The trade was destroyed. It has taken us all these years to get part of that trade back again.

I say that if you enact into law section 2 (b) of the Pittman bill, making it mandatory and automatic upon the declaration of war to require transfer of title, many retaliatory laws will be passed by other nations. Why? Because by so doing—arguing around that circle that my friend from New York just argued, but I think more to the point—immediately we enact the Pittman bill we make ourselves an ally of the strong maritime powers of the world. We say to England, we say to France, we say to Japan: "Henceforth and in the future, if you become embroiled in a great war, come here with your Navy convoying your merchant ships, buy what you please for cash, and transport it from our shores. The little fellows whom you may be fighting will not have this privilege. We now serve notice on the nations of the world that in the future these great United States of America shall be considered the ally only of the powerful nations of the world."

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLOEB. I yield.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman has given a very vivid picture of what would happen under the Pittman bill. Would not somewhat the same situation exist under the McReynolds bill, except that it would be within the discretion of the President to put it into effect?

Mr. KLOEB. The same things could happen if the President in his wisdom would find that the peace and safety of the United States were endangered, and he saw fit to invoke the application of the section. We hope it never will be necessary to invoke it. We have been trying during the past 2 years to enact a so-called neutrality law. We have been trying to cut a suit out of whole cloth to fit whom? To fit the man designated as the "World War of 1917." Always we have before us the terms, conditions, and the circumstances under which that war was fought. But we disregard the fact that in years to come, perhaps 5, 10, or 15 years from now, a war will be fought under totally different terms and conditions, and the suit of cloth that we shall have so carefully builded in these days will be found to be unfitted for the use of the man designated perhaps as the "World War of 1950." Hence we desire to make an elastic suit. We desire to give elasticity in the belt, plenty of room to let out the trousers, length and breadth to fit the conditions under which the next war may be fought. The President may then move to invoke the application of some of these sections in order to preserve our peace and neutrality. We have provided a weapon broad enough to fit the particular case that might come before us at that time.

Mr. Chairman, we are trying to fit into a shoe the foot of the "World War of 1917", wholly disregarding the fact that the foot of a future war may not fit when the time comes. We have been trying to provide ammunition to fit a 16-inch gun, designating that gun the "World War of 1917." When nations go to war again and the neutrality law may be found to be applicable in some degree, it may happen that all we need to preserve the peace and neutral position of the United States, will be ammunition for a small salute gun. Why, then, provide all this ammunition to keep us out of war and make its application mandatory when it may accomplish no purpose?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLOEB. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The gentleman in answer to a question just propounded said that the same thing could occur under what we call the McReynolds bill, but he meant also with such exceptions and limitations as may be prescribed?

Mr. KLOEB. I stressed that in the beginning. There is a fire escape in the McReynolds bill, which I referred to in the beginning, which says sections 4 (a) and 4 (b) may be invoked by the President when he finds the peace and safety of the United States to be endangered, but under such terms and limitations as the Executive may see fit to impose.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLOEB. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. I heartily agree with the gentleman's position and am very much in favor of the McReynolds bill if we have a section dealing with commodities. But I should like to ask the gentleman a question. He is choosing between two evils, in my estimation, and I think in his estimation, when we try to regulate the transportation of commodities at all. I think undoubtedly if we have to regulate commodities the only safety we can have is in the McReynolds bill and not in the Pittman bill.

Mr. KLOEB. The gentleman is correct. I have yet to find any question but that I have found two sides to that question, if it is one of importance. I am willing in this matter to gauge our action by the experiences of the war of 1917, insofar as those experiences may have taught us serious lessons, lessons contained, for instance, in the hold of the Lusitania when she went down having on her decks 159 American citizens. One hundred and twenty-four of them went to the bottom of the Irish Sea.

Lesson no. 1: American citizens ought not to have been on the ship of a belligerent nation; hence the provision you find in the present law and in the McReynolds bill now pending before you.

Lesson no. 2: She contained 4,200 cases of ammunition. That ammunition should never have been sold for export from the United States.

Lesson no. 3: She contained that ammunition sold on credit. In the present law, as well as in the present McReynolds bill pending before you, we mandatorily prohibit those acts, including the extension of loans and credit and the sale and shipment of actual munitions of war.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLOEB. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BIERMANN. I was interested in what the gentleman said about the Pittman bill making this Nation an ally of one side or the other. I think the McReynolds bill is far better than the Pittman bill. But is it not a fact this bill makes us an ally in every conceivable circumstance? For example, we mandatorily prohibit the shipment of ammunition.

Mr. KLOEB. May I answer the question rather abruptly? My time is short. I know what the gentleman is getting at.

May I say in adopting a neutral policy, in laying down laws covering neutrality and in attempting to maintain a neutral position or a neutral state, we aim to treat all sides of the conflict equally and alike, but that does not necessarily mean that all of the nations engaged in war will profit equally and alike from our neutral state. Does that answer the question?

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman made objection that the cash-and-carry system would make us an ally of the nation that controlled the sea.

Mr. KLOEB. That is right.

Mr. BIERMANN. Then we would take sides against a nation that had not built up big munitions plants.

Mr. KLOEB. But the gentleman would not advocate dealing in actual munitions of war, would he?

Mr. BIERMANN. I do not know about that. I do not think so, but I am not prepared to say that. Under this permissive embargo if the President placed an embargo on both sides we automatically take sides against a nation that does not have food, clothing, and the like of that.

Mr. KLOEB. Yes, but there is this difference: When we say in the law now, "This is the law of the land", then in the event the foot fits the shoe in years to come, the nations of the world are now given warning that we intend to act thus and so, if and when conditions demand that we act to preserve our safety and our neutral state. This is different from changing our policy in the middle of the stream or when nations are at war.

Mr. HEALEY. I am glad the gentleman is discussing that particular phase of this matter. The gentleman from New York protested that in the event there was a war and that was the time we were applying this neutrality law, we might commit some hostile act toward a belligerent.

Mr. KLOEB. And yet the gentleman from New York would make mandatory a provision today which serves forcible notice on all the nations of the world that a certain three or four nations shall henceforth be our allies in the event they go to war, and serves notice on the smaller nations that we do not ally ourselves with them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KLOEB. I want to return to the question of economic security.

If we should enact section 2 (b) of the Senate bill into law, other nations would retaliate. Then what is our economic position? Can we say to the nations of the world that we are self-contained? Oh, no. We consume 50 percent of all the commercial tin of the world. We consume as much commercial tin as all other nations of the world combined. Yet not a single ton of tin is produced in the United States. We must rely upon the British Malays, the Dutch East Indies, and Bolivia for our part of the world's tin supply, and this is handled through a monopoly in London.

We produce no manganese. We are dependent upon Russia for manganese. We produce no nickel. We are dependent upon Canada for nickel. We produce no rubber. We are dependent upon the Tropics for our rubber.

All of these products are necessary in the manufacture of munitions of war. Suppose other nations should retaliate. What does that mean?

I was interested in a discussion which occurred in the consideration of the naval appropriations bill. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. UMSTEAD] had the floor. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN] interrupted him, and said, apparently with almost certain assurance, that if the Senate bill became law we would no longer need a powerful navy. But would we not? If the Senate bill became law with a mandatory provision, we would need a more powerful navy than ever before. Why? First, because we say to the small nations, "You may come and get materials here if you go to war, provided you have a large navy." So we accelerate the naval building program of the world. We must keep pace.

We say to ourselves, "If we get into a war, we must have, not a defensive navy, such as we have always boasted of; we must have an offensive navy, sufficient to convoy our merchantmen to Russia for manganese, or over to the British Malays or the Dutch East Indies in order to obtain the necessary supplies of tin."

In addition to this, if we take the position the other body has taken in this matter, we invite a spreading of the theater of war. We invite the nations that cannot come here with their surface vessels, because they do not have a preponderance in surface vessels, to come here with their submarines, to scuttle the trade at our very doorsteps, at the ports along the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. We enlarge the theater of war. Hence we must supply ourselves with a stronger defensive navy than we have ever known in the history of this country, in order to protect our own coastwise shipping from the depredations of nations engaged in deadly combat.

That is the answer to the argument that we may need a smaller navy in the event we enact mandatory legislation.

On this question of extending Executive authority our opponents say, "Stop! Do not give the President this authority. Do not place authority in the Government."

Have you ever stopped to think that under the Constitution the President today is the sole and unhampered negotiator of our foreign affairs? Have you ever stopped to think that under the Constitution the President today is the supreme Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and as such might overnight, without authority, get us into war? Do you know that some years ago President Wilson sent a portion of the United States fleet down to Vera Cruz and ordered the bombardment of that Mexican port without authority of Congress, and in so doing acted within his constitutional rights?

Why hesitate, then, to give to the Government of the United States some little authority to keep us out of war?

Gentlemen, do not enact this so-called mandatory legislation. Let us be safe. Let us be fair with ourselves and with the people of our country.

Mr. Chairman, we are the last remaining bulwark of western civilization. If we permit ourselves to become engulfed in another world catastrophe and our manhood to be bled white, then it can mean but one thing—the abdication of the supremacy of the white race and the ascendancy of the yellow race.

Let me remind my listeners that no law or set of laws, that no precautionary steps that we might now take can keep us out of another world war if we have not the will to stay out. These laws can only serve as a polar star to guide us over treacherous shoals.

Joseph Tumulty, secretary to President Wilson, wrote as follows in 1921:

> No sooner was the President's proclamation of neutrality announced than the differences in points of view in racial stocks began to manifest themselves in language, both intemperate and passionate, until his advice to his country "to be neutral in fact as well as in name" became a dead and expressionless thing.

The verdict, my friends, whether we shall go in or stay out of the next world war, if and when it comes—and God grant that it does not come—rests finally with the American people.

By enacting the McReynolds bill into law we will be taking such precautionary steps as are reasonable and advisable from our present-day viewpoint. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, after listening to this magnificent debate on both sides, I have been wondering what the ordinary citizen visiting here would conclude as to the relative merits of this legislation. I have a notion he would be a little like I am at this moment, reenacting the fable of the jackass who starved to death between two bales of hay because he could not make up his mind which one to take a bite out of. [Laughter.]

I have been a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee for 12 years, and in all those years I have never seen a more devoted or a more intelligent grappling with a great and challenging problem than this committee has exhibited in connection with this legislation. I feel deeply indebted to our distinguished chairman the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] for the leadership he has given us. I feel equally indebted to the young and vigorous gentleman from the Hyde Park district, who is about the right age to go on the Supreme Court now [laughter]; but personally I am not wildly enthusiastic about any of this legislation.

We are here today in response to a great spiritual movement in this country which takes the form of a hatred and an abhorrence of war, and I agree with that movement with all my heart. If there is any performance of the human race that sinks us below the level of the animal in intelligence and results, it is the mechanized murder of modern warfare. In the good old days, when men were men, when they stood up toe to toe and fought it out, there were some alleviations. That kind of a struggle was a pretty good thing. But when you call on the entire resources of modern science for the express purpose of blowing to pieces the young manhood of the world, it seems to me so absurd, so wicked, so wasteful, so inconclusive that I cannot understand how any sane people, if there are any left in the world, will resort to such a practice.

If the whole world were not as crazy as hell itself at this minute we would not be here discussing this subject, but we all seem to be crazy. I do not know what has gone wrong with us. What we seem to need is not more warships, but more lunatic asylums. I am afraid that there is where most of us belong, especially on this side of the aisle. [Laughter.] We may have a few sane ones left over here, but there hardly seems to be enough of them for seed corn. [Laughter.]

This tremendous spiritual reaction against war manifests itself in this country by a carefully nurtured program that we call neutrality. What is neutrality? Why, it is a species of neuter—it is neither one thing nor the other; and, Mr. Chairman, I agree with my friend O'CONNOR of New York. I have never seen any one in the world, especially an Irishman, who could be neuter on any subject; I am not. Neuter means neither one thing nor the other. It comes from two words—"ne", meaning not, and "uter" meaning either. That is, neutrality is in essence neither one thing nor the other.

So this passion against war has developed into a desire to have a neutrality program; and, true to the American obsession, we have decided to enact this beautiful thing we call neutrality into law.

I do not suppose there is any more complete evidence of the moral collapse and intellectual imbecility of our people than the universal belief you can enact a law to govern everything and settle everything. Why, you can put all the laws on the books until time is no more, and if you have a war you can no more control the emotions and passions of the racial mixture that we call America with respect to that war than if you did not have any law on the books at all. You have all kinds of laws against various forms of love making. How do they work? I do not mean the love making, but the laws. [Laughter.] They are, as a rule, more completely observed in the breach than otherwise.

I am in complete sympathy with the wholesome passion against war. I recognize that it logically or illogically manifests itself in the thought of neutrality, and, naturally, neutrality comes here at once to demand a law.

Personally, I should like to see the present neutrality law made permanent with a regulation in it against permitting people to collect money in this country for the support of foreign wars; that is to say, a law to forbid the making this Nation a laboratory for inflaming and spreading the racial hatreds of the rest of the world. After we have done this, I should like to see the present law extended to apply to civil war, and then we might follow the suggestion of our friend from New York [Mr. FISH] and have the rest of it temporary, although I think if we would just stop where we are, with the additions I have indicated, and try that for a few years more, we would escape an immense amount of difficulty and trouble.

Let us see what will happen if we put this thing through, either the mandatory Pittman bill, which has been damned so definitely here, or the discretionary McReynolds bill, which has been equally damned and so ably defended. Personally, I should like to see us continue and endure the legislative ills we have rather than fly to others that we know not of, and see how it will work in practice. What have we at stake? We have our world commerce at stake. We have our economic roots struck deep into the world.

We have our shipping. During the war I was in charge of all of the shipyards and thousands of industrial plants, and we built more and worse ships than were ever built in the same length of time in the history of the world. Where are they now? Tied up like a brood of drowned kittens in some bay. Why? Because we were not prepared for war; because we did not believe war would come to us; because we did not want it to come. But it did come.

So I say here today, we have our roots in industry and commerce throughout the world, and we cannot help but have a relationship that will test us at once if some world war breaks out. What will it cost us if we destroy our shipping? I should like to see the American merchant marine put on a basis that would be worthy of this Nation. How can it be if you tie it up here with a lot of sweet nursery rhymes and put on board a lot of wet nurses and have the President or somebody else see to it that these delicately organized sailors shall blow their noses properly and—above all things—not go near the water?

I have neither the learning nor the eloquence to properly unfold this momentous matter with which we are dealing today. But I can come to the point of what I have to say in a few words. I have listened to these endless and sincere arguments before our committee. I have had many letters on the subject from ladies and gentlemen who seem certain that they can solve the problem. But my anxiety over what is going on in this Nation at the present time remains. Here we are, the greatest nation the world has ever seen—we admit it—with 130,000,000 people, with the blood of the dominant breeds of the world in our veins. Here we are, with the greatest heaped-up wealth ever achieved in the history of the world. Here we are, with the greatest fabric of religion and learning that any nation has ever erected in its history.

Here we are the great outstanding big brother of mankind, and what is it proposed that we do in and for a world torn and distressed and broken and liable to fall into irretrievable ruin? We propose to lock our doors and turn our backs upon the distracted world and refuse to face the moral obligations that inhere in our supreme greatness, that inhere in our widespread knowledge, that inhere in our enormous wealth and in our free institutions. From a world whose wounds we could heal we propose to shut ourselves away, neutralized, sterilized spiritually and morally. This legislation is a symptom of a moral sterilization of the American people in connection with our tremendous inescapable obligations to the rest of the world. I am worried by this attitude. I am bowed down and distressed by it. I am going to vote for this legislation in the form it finally assumes, because if I do not, my people will be tempted to think that I want to kill and maim young men on the battlegrounds of a world war; but after I have cast my vote I shall not be certain that I have made a real step toward the one solution of the problem of war which lies not in more law but in the awakening among the American people of a new sense of that moral obligation which strength and character owe to the weak ones of the earth. That is what we have to come to, and God help us to do it before it is too late. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I believe the best proposal to keep America out of war is a referendum on war. Next to that is a really adequate neutrality law. I believe that if the Constitution were so amended as to permit the people to vote on a declaration of war America would never send its boys into foreign countries to be slaughtered in the settlement of quarrels of alien origin. I have introduced a resolution for a constitutional amendment to give the people the right to vote on war except in the case of attack or invasion. Within a short time I shall file a discharge petition at the Speaker's desk to bring that resolution before the House for debate and a vote. I will be extremely grateful to Members of the House if they will examine that resolution (H. J. Res. 199) and give it their support.

I have also introduced a neutrality bill and it is concerning this latter measure that I intend to speak today. My neutrality bill is what Latin scholars would call sui generis. It has no counterpart. It is an orphan in the prolific and colorful family of bills. I will frankly admit that so far my neutrality bill has not made much of a dent on the general situation. As far as I can ascertain it has only one supporter and that man is myself. I shall hope in my speech today that by great forensic effort and the irresistible force of logic I may be able to make at least one convert, in which event the forces back of my bill will be augmented 100 percent. After the battle is over and the steam roller has rolled and the McReynolds bill is passed I will be conquered but I will not be convinced. I will try to exhibit some of the spirit and spunk of little Jeff, who, when Mutt has given him an awful beating, always rises with fire in his eye to exclaim: "I still think I'm right."

The last Democratic national platform, to which we on this side of the aisle are supposed to owe our fealty, rises to condemn the neutrality bill that is before the House and likewise the neutrality bill that has passed the other Chamber. Let me quote that platform on the subject of neutrality:

We shall continue—

to observe a true neutrality in the disputes of others; * * * to guard against being drawn by political commitments, international banking, or private trade into any war which may develop anywhere.

Please note especially our party's pledge that "private trade" shall not be allowed to involve America in war.

But do the McReynolds bill and the Pittman bill protect America from becoming involved in war through private trading? They most certainly do not. Both bills allow the building up in our country of an enormous war trade in everything except munitions, and therefore both bills are in direct conflict with the spirit, if not the letter, of the Philadelphia platform. Under the mandate of the November election we are supposed in this Congress to be writing a permanent neutrality law that will keep us out of war throughout the years to come, but what we really are doing is to write a law that in all human probability will get us into war through the lure of war profits. The requirement that the title of goods shall pass to the purchaser before the goods may move, as proposed in the Pittman bill and as suggested, subject to Executive discretion, in the McReynolds bill, is no protection at all against our involvement in war. "Cash and carry" sounds well, but it would transfer foreign wars to our shores. With 100 submarines waiting outside the 3-mile limit to sink vessels carrying American goods, is anyone credulous enough to suppose that we could escape being drawn into the conflict?

I have the honor to represent a splendid industrial district. It is one of the great industrial districts of the United States. We have perhaps a thousand factories, many of which are going through very lean years. While I am anxious to help these industries, I will never vote for any measure that puts profits ahead of the peace and security of my country, and I know that I express the thoughts of our fine industrial community when I say that they do not want any profits that are founded on skulls and crossbones.

More than anything else, I should like to see our country relieved of the war peril that hangs over it like the sword of Damocles, and that, I believe, is the sentiment of the fine constituency I represent in this Chamber. I am against the McReynolds bill with its transparent adherence to war profits and its well-meant but mischievous Executive discretionary provisions, which are a standing invitation to unwise or venturesome Presidents to juggle the Nation into war. It is unholy wedlock that brings peace and profits to the marriage altar, and no good can possibly come from such an abortive union.

I am so fed up on neutrality bills that appear to be noble gestures but really mean little, if anything, that it is difficult for me to speak or write calmly on the subject.

I am opposed to the McReynolds bill, and I am opposed to the Pittman bill, and I am opposed to every other so-called neutrality bill that clings to wartime profits to be derived by trading with belligerents. As all of the neutrality bills I have seen, except my own, hang on like grim death to war profits in some form or to some extent, I find myself in about the same situation as the pugnacious Irishman with whom his entire regiment was out of step.

If I had my way I would relegate to the realm of innocuous desuetude the McReynolds bill and the Pittman bill and all the pack and parcel of neutrality bills that are so tenacious of war profits, and I would pass a bill that would automatically cut off all trade with a nation when that nation becomes a belligerent, and then America would have real protection from war.

The first question we should decide when we devote our attention to neutrality legislation is whether our anxiety to stay out of war is strong enough to make us willing to pay the price of staying out of war.

We should engage in a little self-examination, a little introspection to find out our real desire. We should in all candor ask ourselves this question:

"Do we really want to make America immune from war or do we want to listen to the siren voice of the war profiteer and fix up a little arrangement that will furnish a measure of protection from war, and at the same time insure the profiteer his dip in case war comes?"

That is all the McReynolds bill does; that is all the Pittman bill does. Each of those bills affords a little protection to America from war's terrors but at the same time takes good care of the interests that fatten on the profits of war. Each of those bills affords a measure of protection when it ought to be furnishing full protection. We can keep out of war if we will pay the price of keeping out of war. We can make America immune, or practically immune, from war if we will give up the idea of extracting any profits from war and make up our minds to stay out of the whole bloody business.

There is an old saying, as true as it is ancient, that "you cannot have your cake and eat it, too." Both the McReynolds bill and the Pittman bill seek to accomplish that dexterous feat, but it will not work. With charming inconsistency, both bills seek to establish America's neutrality, while at the same time allowing belligerent nations to build up a vast war trade in America. The two propositions are like oil and water. They will not mix. We cannot long have peace and revel in war profits at the same time. If we tie ourselves to war profits, we cease to be immune and place ourselves in a perilous position where we are almost certain, sooner or later, to be dragged into the swirling maelstrom of war.

When I think of the little mite of protection against war provided in the McReynolds bill and the Pittman bill and other so-called neutrality measures before Congress that are so framed that they do not interfere with war trade, I am reminded of the stingy man and the insurance agent. The stingy man protested that a premium of $25 a year was altogether too high.

"Fix me up 50 cents' worth, and I'll take it", he said.

We cannot insure America against war unless we are willing to pay the full premium. The McReynolds bill and the Pittman bill make a 50-cent payment on a $25 premium obligation, and as a result America gets no insurance, which is tragic and distressing, since nearly all competent observers seem to agree that we are headed with tremendous velocity toward another World War which, if it comes, will destroy civilization.

The McReynolds bill and the Pittman bill suffer from several fatal defects. They allow American ships to carry goods into war zones where they may be sunk. They place no limit on a belligerent's wartime trade with America in goods not strictly munitions of war. Everybody knows that when American manufacturers and exporters become bound to a belligerent nation by the golden strands of fabulous profits it probably will be only a question of time until those attachments will drag America into war to protect this trade. The McReynolds bill, the Pittman bill, and nearly all of the pending neutrality bills leave the door wide open to belligerents to buy goods in America that do not come within the category of munitions of war. Everybody knows that such war materials and supplies are as essential as munitions to winning a war and therefore we have a misnamed neutrality bill that will put America deeply into any war situation on the side of a favored belligerent who will buy our goods. War trade on a huge scale inevitably means involvement on the side of our customers. Under these pending neutrality bills we are going to trade again, just as we did in 1914. In fact, we already are in the beginning of a war boom, as part of our present prosperity in the steel and automobile industries may be traced to large foreign war orders.

When this neutrality legislation was in the embryonic stage Walter Runciman, president of the British Board of Trade, visited Washington, and a special dispatch to the New York Times on January 31 last told the purpose of his visit.

He made no secret—

The dispatch said—of his concern over the prospect that the United States' neutrality policy might close the doors of the United States on foodstuffs and other essential exports to Great Britain in event of war. It is recognized that should an extreme mandatory neutrality policy of embargo be enacted, it might discourage Great Britain from consenting to reciprocal-trade negotiations with the United States.

On the other hand, there is a prospect that, should discretion in applying embargoes on foodstuffs and other secondary materials essential in wartime be voted, or should the permanent legislation refrain from vesting embargo authority in the President over other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war, British concern on this score might be allayed.

It is safe to say that this emissary of Britain must be well pleased with the McReynolds bill, the measure now before the House, because under it no limit is placed on the amount of "foodstuffs and other essential exports" that may be sold by Americans to a belligerent and because, on account of Great Britain's superior purchasing power and her mastery of the seas, the prospect is that this profitable trade would make America a potential ally of Great Britain in any war in which she might engage.

There is one kind of neutrality law, and one kind only, that would keep us out of war. That is a law which by mandatory embargo would automatically cut off all exports of all kinds and all loans and credits from a nation when that nation goes to war. No nation could find fault with such a law, because it would be heralded as America's fixed policy, known to all men and applying impartially to all nations. It would be a high price to pay in the sacrifice of profits, but small in comparison with the cost of involvement in another war. It would be small compared with the homes that would be wrecked, the lives of our precious young men that would be lost, the tears of widows and mothers and children that would be shed when war comes.

With war clouds lowering and dictators thrumming the strings of war, now is the time to enact a neutrality law that will really and truly protect America. Anything less than that is toying with a situation of tragic gravity. If we are unwilling to go that far in order to make the job satisfactory and complete, let us frankly acknowledge that we have placed trade above the happiness of American homes and the peace and security of countless generations of children yet unborn. Let us throw up our hands and admit that we have surrendered to the fleshpots.

I present herewith the text of my bill, H. R. 4555, which I submit is a real neutrality bill:

A bill to establish the neutrality of the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the outbreak of war between two or more foreign nations the President shall issue a proclamation forbidding (1) exports of all kinds and (2) loans and credits to said belligerent countries or to the nationals of said belligerent countries. Said prohibition shall be made effective in a similar way by proclamation against nations that may enter the war subsequent to its outbreak and the nationals of said nations and to factions engaged in a civil war.

SEC. 2. The penalty for violating such proclamation shall be a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 3. No vessel of American registry shall be chartered or used to transport goods in violation of the President's proclamation forbidding said shipments, and the penalty for violation of this section shall be cancelation of the registration of said vessel.

SEC. 4. Upon the outbreak of war between two or more foreign nations the President shall issue a proclamation notifying American citizens that travel on the vessels of belligerent nations shall be at the traveler's own risk: Provided, That the notification shall not apply to a citizen on a voyage begun in advance of the date of the President's proclamation, if he has had no opportunity to discontinue his voyage after that date.

SEC. 5. Whenever during a war between two or more foreign nations it shall come to the notice of the Secretary of Labor that any alien is engaged in the United States or any possession thereof in propaganda activities other than the legitimate exercise of free speech and by such activities is seeking to win the favor of the United States for one or more of the belligerents, or otherwise to interfere with the position of neutrality of the United States, the Secretary shall immediately order the arrest of said alien and shall as soon as practicable deport him to the country from which he came.

SEC. 6. Recruiting in the United States in behalf of any belligerent foreign nation is forbidden. The penalty for violating this section shall be a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 7. Whoever (1) disguises the identity of a consignor or (2) camouflages the nature or the destination of goods intended for ultimate delivery to a belligerent nation or to nationals of a belligerent nation shall be subject to a fine of $10,000 or imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

Enactment of the bill I have introduced would, I believe, give America a real neutrality law. A bill that seeks to combine peace and war profits, such as the measure pending before the House today, may give us the form, but it will never give us the substance, of neutrality. I am fearful that it will break down under the first strain of war and in the end will prove a tragic disappointment to the American people.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY].

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about neutrality. When we went into the World War we went into it with a very high motive, to make the world safe for democracy. We went into the war to end war. History has shown the inaccuracy and fallacy of that attempt. The neutrality measure we are attempting to enact is to avert those dangers and those fallacies in the future.

Mr. Chairman, the measure now under discussion is a peace act rather than a neutrality act. While it does outline the course we shall follow in the future as a neutral nation, the primary objective of the proposed legislation is to insure peace and the uninterrupted peaceful pursuits of economic and social well-being. Enactment of such legislation is in answer to the hopes and prayers of all Americans since that memorable Armistice Day of November 11, 1918. After more than 18 years of inaction, we are ready at last to put up the first barrier against again being drawn into foreign wars. We now have within our power the opportunity to erect a strong and permanent barrier against such wars, but we face the possibility of enacting only a weak and ineffective barrier. The people of this country want the strongest possible legislation, and we must seize this opportunity to fulfill their wishes.

If we choose profits today we may well find that we will have neither profits nor peace tomorrow. The House Joint Resolution 252, introduced by our distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations [Mr. McREYNOLDS], unfortunately offers the possibility of profits today, which will end up with neither profits nor peace tomorrow. It reenacts the provisions of existing law which are generally approved and makes a notable improvement in regard to the exclusion of armed merchantmen, as well as submarines, from the use of our ports and territorial waters when we are neutral. There are only two sections of the pending resolution which I wish to discuss and which, pray God, we may be able to revise to insure us of a course of real neutrality and permanent peace. Those sections deal with the limitations placed on Americans traveling on vessels of a belligerent nation and the manner in which we shall conduct trade with belligerent nations.

In attempting to restrict the travel of our nationals upon belligerent vessels and in attempting to place controls over our commerce with those belligerents we inevitably raise opposition on the grounds of international law and upon the grounds that we would be discarding the historic principles of freedom of the seas for which this country has stood. Only an idealist of the first water can base arguments upon international law, because international law during periods of war is entirely an ideal affair. The fact is that in times of peace states agree to certain legal rules by which they refuse to be bound when urgent self-interest dictates a contrary course. Hard-pressed belligerents always have and always will violate neutral rights. Those may be facts that are repellant to our ideals, but they are facts just the same, and are borne out by the experiences of the past. A country at war, fighting with its back to the wall, is just as much interested in international law as is a hog in Einstein's theory of relativity.

I know that there are those who will hold that we cannot cast off the traditional American doctrine of freedom of the seas. Perfectly honestly, I cannot see how anyone can maintain that that is a standard American doctrine. It is of sufficient importance in this debate to briefly summarize our experience with that doctrine and to decide whether or not we have been able to maintain that doctrine in international practice.

The first American naval policy was formulated in 1793 in response to the British order of February 18 recalling all British sailors, and in response to the practices adopted by France and Great Britain during the Napoleonic wars. As an infant state with a keen desire to build up our carrying trade we adopted the principle of "free ships free goods", and "neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag", and "blockades in order to be binding must be effective—that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy." On May 6, 1794, instructions were given to John Jay to incorporate the principle of "free ships free goods" in the treaty he was to execute with Great Britain. (See American State Papers, Foreign Relations I, p. 472 ff.) The Jay treaty, dated November 19, 1794, did not embody that principle. (Miller, D. H., Treaties and Other International Acts of the U. S. II, p. 245 ff.) Great Britain continued to regard the provisions outlined in the Consolato del mare of 1645 as guiding British naval policy. We were able to secure French assent to our principle in the treaty of September 30, 1800, although we acquiesced in the principle that enemy ships made enemy goods. (See Miller, II, p. 456 ff.) The conflict between British naval policy and that established by this country led up to the War of 1812, and in the Treaty of Ghent which ended that war December 24, 1814, there is no recognition by the British Government of the American claims as to freedom of the seas. (See Miller, II, p. 574 ff.)

England finally recognized the American doctrines when she acceded to the terms of the Declaration of Paris, 1856. By 1914 the Declaration of Paris had been acceded to by every nation in the world except the United States and Venezuela. However, it must be pointed out that that declaration made no definition of what constituted contraband of war. From 1856 until the Declaration of London in 1908 there was no substantive modification or change in the practice or application of freedom of the seas. No war during that period furnished a necessary incident to bring about any change. The Declaration of London established a contraband list, a conditional contraband list, and a noncontraband list, but it provided that the absolute contraband list and the conditional contraband list could be added to in time of war by notification. The Declaration of London was not ratified by a single state. That brief treatment brings us up to the conditions existent at the outbreak of the World War and supplies an adequate background to interpret the actions of the belligerents in that war as they affected neutral trade.

All the principles of freedom of the seas embodied in the Declaration of Paris were swept overboard during the World War. Both sides rejected the definition of contraband and limited contraband outlined in the Declaration of London. The advent of submarine war brought to an end any hope of maintaining the practice of warning, visit and search. The British policy of searching the actual cargo of a neutral vessel brought to an end the established practice of searching only the ship's books. Practically over night neutral nations found themselves face to face with a situation that had no precedents in history. Neutral nations endeavoring to trade with belligerent nations found their trade endangered by confiscation or destruction. Neutrals traveling upon vessels of a belligerent nation were no longer safe. How anyone can study the history of the World War and come to the conclusions that we can protect the lives of our nationals when they travel upon belligerent's vessels or how we can protect our commerce with belligerent nations without being drawn into the maelstrom of war is beyond my imagination.

During the World War the distinction between contraband and conditional contraband was entirely disregarded. Many of the articles classed as noncontraband in the Declaration of London were included on the contraband lists. At this point, in order to show how inclusive modern conceptions of contraband have become, I insert a list of contraband and conditional contraband as published in the London Gazette of July 3, 1917:

SCHEDULE 1. ABSOLUTE CONTRABAND

Abrasive materials (see "Emery").
Acetic acid and acetates.
Acetic anhydride.
Acetic ether.
Acetones and raw or finished materials usable for their preparation.
Aircraft of all kinds, including airplanes, airships, balloons, and their component parts, together with accessories and articles suitable for use in connection with aircraft.
Albumen.
Alcohols, including fusel oils and wood spirit and their derivatives and preparations.
Aluminum and its alloys, alumina, and salts of alumina.
Ammonia.
Ammonia liquor.
Ammonium salts.
Aniline and its derivatives.
Animals, saddle, draft, and pack, suitable or which may become suitable for use in war.
Antimony, and the sulphides and oxides of antimony.
Apparatus which can be used for the storage or projecting of compressed or liquefied gases, flame, acids, or other destructive agents capable of use in warlike operations, and their component parts.
Armor plates.
Arms of all kinds, including arms for sporting purposes, and their component parts.
Arsenic and its compounds.
Arsenical ore.
Asbestos.
Asphalt, Balata (see Rubber).
Bamboo.
Barbed wire, and the implements for fixing and cutting the same.
Barium chlorate and perchlorate.
Barium sulphate (barytes).
Bauxite.
Benzine (see Mineral oils).
Benzol and its mixtures and derivatives.
Bitumen.
Bleaching powder.
Bone black.
Bones in any form, whole or crushed; bone ash.
Borax, boric acid, and other boron compounds.
Bromine.
Cadmium, cadmium alloys, and cadmium ore.
Calcium acetate, nitrate, and carbide.
Calcium sulphate.
Camp equipment, articles of, and their component parts.
Camphor.
Capsicum.
Carbolic acid (see Phenol).
Carbon disulphide.
Carbon, halogen compounds of.
Carborundum (see Emery).
Carbonyl chloride (see Phosgene).
Cartridges (see Projectiles).
Caustic potash.
Caustic soda.
Cellulcid.
Cerium and its alloys and compounds.
Charges (see Projectiles).
Checks (see Gold).
Chloride of lime.
Chlorides, metallic (except chloride of sodium), and metalloidic.
Chlorine.
Chromium and its alloys, salts, compounds, and ores.
Clothing and equipment of a distinctively military character.
Cobalt and its alloys, salts, compounds, and ores.
Copper pyrites and other copper ores.
Copper, unwrought and part wrought; copper wire; alloys and compounds of copper.
Cork, including cork dust.
Corundum (see Emery).
Cotton, raw, linters, cotton waste, cotton yarns, cotton piece goods, and other cotton products capable of being used in the manufacture of explosives.
Coupons (see Gold).
Credit notes (see Gold).
Cresol and its mixtures and derivatives.
Cyanamide.
Debit notes (see Gold).
Diamonds suitable for industrial purposes.
Electrical appliances adapted for use in war, and their component parts.
Electrolytic iron.
Emery, corundum, carborundum, and all other abrasive materials, whether natural or artificial, and the manufactures thereof.
Equipment (see Clothing).
Explosives, materials used in the manufacture of.
Explosives specially prepared for use in war.
Fatty acids.
Feldspar.
Ferro-alloys of all kinds.
Ferro-silicon.
Fibers, vegetable, and yarns made therefrom.
Financial documents (see Gold).
Flax.
Forges, field, and their component parts.
Formic acid and formates.
Formic ether.
Fusel oil (see Alcohols).
Gases for war purposes and materials for production thereof.
Glycerine.

Gold, silver, paper money, securities, negotiable instruments, checks, drafts, orders, warrants, coupons, letters of credit, delegation or advice, credit and debit notes, or other documents which in themselves, or if completed, or if acted upon by the recipient, authorize, confirm, or give effect to the transfer of money, credit, or securities.
Goldbeaters' skin.
Gun mountings and their component parts.
Gutta Percha (see Rubber).
Hematite iron ore.
Hematite pig iron.
Hair, animals of all kinds, and tops, noils, and yards of animal hair.
Harness of all kinds, of a distinctively military character.
Hemp.
Hides of cattle, buffaloes, and horses.
Hydrochloric acid.
Implements and apparatus designed exclusively for the manufacture of munitions of war, or for the manufacture or repair of arms or of war material for use on land or sea.
Incendiary materials for war purposes.
Insulating materials, raw or manufactured.
Iodine and its compounds.
Iridium and its alloys and compounds.
Iron (electrolytic).
Iron pyrites.
Kapok.
Lathes, machines, and tools, capable of being employed in the manufacture of munitions of war.
Lead and lead ore.
Leather, undressed or dressed, suitable for saddlery, harness, military boots, or military clothing.
Leather belting, hydraulic leather, pump leather.
Letters of credit, delegation or advice (see Gold).
Light-producing materials for war purposes.
Limbers and limber boxes and their component parts.
Lithium (see Strontium).
Lubricants.
Machines (see Lathes).
Manganese and manganese ore.
Manganese dioxide.
Maps and plans of any place within the territory of any belligerent, or within the area of military operations, on a scale of 4 miles to 1 inch, or any larger scale, and reproductions on any scale, by photography or otherwise, of such maps or plans.
Mercury.
Metallic sulphites and thiosulphates.
Mineral oils, including benzine and motor spirit.
Molybdenum and molybdenite.
Monazite sand.
Motor spirit (see Mineral oils).
Motor vehicles of all kinds, and their component parts and accessories.
Naphtha (see Solvent naphtha).
Naphthalene and its mixtures and derivatives.
Negotiable instruments (see Gold).
Nickel and its alloys, salts, compounds, and ores.
Nitrates of all kinds.
Nitric acid.
Oleum (see Sulphuric acid).
Orders (see Gold).
Osmium and its alloys and compounds.
Oxalic acid and oxalates.
Palladium and its alloys and compounds.
Paper money (see Gold).
Peppers
Phenates
Phenol (carbolic acid) and its mixtures and derivatives.
Phosgene (Carbonyl chloride).
Phosphorus and its compounds.
Photographic films, plates, and paper, sensitized.
Pitch.
Platinum and its alloys and compounds.
Potassium salts.
Powder specially prepared for use in war.
Projectiles, charges, cartridges, and grenades of all kinds, and their component parts.
Prussiate of soda.
Quebracho wood (see Tanning substance).
Quillaia bark.
Ramie
Rangefinders and their component parts.
Rattans.
Resinous products
Rhodium and its alloys and compounds.
Rubber (including raw, waste, and reclaimed rubber, solutions and jellies containing rubber and any other preparations containing balata and gutta percha, and the following varieties of rubber, viz: Borneo, Guayule, Jelutong, Palembang, Pontianac, and all other substances containing caoutchouc), and goods made wholly or partly of rubber.
Ruthenium and its alloys and compounds.
Sabadilla seeds and preparations thereof.
Searchlights and their component parts.
Securities (see Gold).
Selenium.
Silk, artificial, and the manufactures thereof.
Silk in all forms and the manufactures thereof; silk cocoons.
Silver (see Gold).
Skins of calves, pigs, sheep, goats, and deer.
Smoke-producing materials for war purposes.
Soap.
Soda lime.
Sodium.
Sodium chlorate and perchlorate.
Sodium cyanide.
Solvent naphtha and its mixtures and derivatives.
Starch.
Steel containing tungsten or molybdenum.
Strontium and lithium compounds and mixtures containing the same.
Submarine sound-signaling apparatus.
Sulphur.
Sulphur dioxide.
Sulphuric acid; fuming sulphuric acid (oleum).
Sulphuric ether.
Talc.
Tanning substances of all kinds, including quebracho wood and extracts for use in tanning.
Tantalum and its alloys, salts, compounds, and ores.
Tar.
Thiosulphates (see Metallic sulphites).
Thorium and its alloys and compounds.
Tin; chloride of tin; tin ore.
Titanium and its salts and compounds; titanium ore.
Tuluol and its mixtures and derivatives.
Tools (see Lathes).
Tungsten and its alloys and compounds; tungsten ores.
Turpentine (oil and spirit).
Tires for motor vehicles and for cycles, together with articles or materials especially adapted for use in the manufacture or repair of tires.
Uranium and its salts and compounds; uranium ore.
Urea.
Vanadium and its alloys, salts, compounds, and ores.
Vegetable fibers (see Fibers).
Wagons, military and their component parts.
Warrants (see Gold).
Warships, including boats and their component parts of such a nature that they can only be used on a vessel of war.
Waxes of all kinds.
Wire, barbed (see Barbed wire).
Wire, steel and iron.
Wood spirit (see Alcohols).
Wood tar and wood-tar oil.
Woods of all kinds capable of use in war.
Wool, raw, combed, or carded; wool waste; wool tops and noils; woolen or worsted yarns.
Xylol and its mixtures and derivatives.
Zinc and its alloys.
Zinc ore.
Zirconia.
Zirconium and its alloys and compounds.

SCHEDULE 2. CONDITIONAL CONTRABAND

Algae, lichens, and mosses.
Barrels and casks, empty, of all kinds, and their component parts.
Bladders.
Boots and shoes suitable for use in war.
Casein.
Casings.
Casks (see Barrels).
Charcoal (see Fuel).
Chronometers.
Clothing and fabrics for clothing suitable for use in war.
Docks; floating, and their component parts; parts of docks.
Explosives not specially prepared for use in war.
Field glasses.
Foodstuffs.
Forage and feeding stuffs for animals.
Fuel, including charcoal, other than mineral oils.
Furs utilizable for clothing suitable for use in war.
Gelatin and substances used in the manufacture thereof.
Glue and substances used in the manufacture thereof.
Guts.
Harness and saddlery.
Horseshoes and shoeing materials.
Lichens (see Algae).
Mosses (see Algae).
Nautical instruments, all kinds of.
Oils and fats, animal, fish, and vegetable, other than those capable of use as lubricants and not including essential oils.
Oleaginous seeds, nuts, and kernels.
Powder not specially prepared for use in war.
Railway materials; both fixed and rolling stock.
Sausage skins.
Skins utilizable for clothing suitable for use in war.
Sponges, raw and prepared.
Telegraphs, materials for; materials for wireless telegraphs.
Telephones, materials for.
Telescopes.
Vehicles of all kinds, other than motor vehicles, available for use in war, and their component parts.
Vessels, craft, and boats of all kinds.
Yeast.

The Italian Official Gazette publication of prize rules shows the sweeping character of contraband goods in modern warfare. Those rules defined only two kinds of noncontraband: Medical supplies and the stores designated solely for the use of the ship and its passengers. (See Gazette Ufficiale, Apr. 26, 1917, no. 98.)

During the World War the submarine took its place among the naval armaments of the world. Today every maritime power has fleets of such vessels. Any future policy must be postulated upon a recognition of the fact that submarines will be used in future wars. Future policies must be based upon a clear understanding of the peculiar advantages and disadvantages of the submarine as an instrument of naval warfare.

In future wars when we place American cargoes on vessels bound to belligerent countries we must fully recognize the fact that if those vessels are attacked by submarines there will be no possibility of the submarine giving warning and then going through with the processes of visit and search. Our nationals, traveling upon the vessels of a belligerent nation, must clearly realize those facts. A submarine is the slowest and most frail of naval craft. Any attempt made by it to stop, visit, and search a national vessel would lead to the destruction of the submarine. A merchant vessel with light-caliber armament is fully capable of sinking a submarine. One of the most notable examples of such a success is that found in the performance of the British ship Carmania. Under the processes of visit and search, even an unarmed merchant vessel assumes an offensive character because of its superior speed, which would enable it to maneuver and ram the undersea craft. Our State Department fully recognized the vulnerability of submarines in the notation sent by Secretary of State Lansing to the Allied Powers dated January 18, 1916, which read in part as follows:

> Even a merchant ship carrying a small-caliber gun would be able to use it effectively against a submarine. * * * Consequently the placing of guns on merchantmen in the present day of submarine warfare can be explained only on the ground of a purpose to render merchantmen superior in force to submarines and to prevent warning and visit and search by them. Any armament, therefore, on a merchant vessel would seem to have the character of offensive armament.

No great stretch of the imagination is necessary to prophesy that in the next war aircraft will be used to harry merchant vessels carrying cargoes of supplies to enemy destinations. Everyone realizes that an airplane has no possibility of visiting and searching a merchant vessel. These conditions being clearly understood, we are faced with two inescapable facts: (1) The American national who travels upon the merchant vessels of a belligerent power must necessarily place himself in jeopardy of loss of life; (2) that American goods bound for any part of a belligerent power, whether in vessels of American or other registry, stand in jeopardy of being destroyed at sea or confiscated under modern estimations of contraband and limited contraband of war. The very character of submarine and air warfare sounds the doom of the contention that neutral goods in enemy ships retain their neutral character.

In future wars our neutral trade with belligerent nations cannot help but be vitally affected by one other development of the late war. That is the modern practice of blockade. The American principle of effective blockade was entirely swept aside when the Allies established their blockade against all German ports and when Germany made her declarations of the extended war zones. Our ships and those of other neutrals were barred from carrying articles and commodities, regardless of their character, to the civilian population in Germany and Belgium just as effectively as they were barred from carrying munitions of war. On her side Germany carried on a ruthless campaign of submarine warfare, seeking to cut off from the allied ports vessels with cargoes which would aid those powers to continue the war. Both sides recognized the fact that no nation can carry on a war unless (1) her civilian population has the necessities of life; (2) her industrial production can be maintained by access to the necessary raw materials; and (3) that no army in the field can be maintained unless both it and the supporting civilian population can be maintained on a decent standard of living. In the broadest sense the entire economic structure of a nation was brought into the military machine, and everything that was essential in keeping the machine operative became contraband of war.

These conditions make possible only three courses of action for this country to follow in future periods of neutrality: (1) Allow free trade in what we consider to be noncontraband of war materials with any power offering a market and protect such trade with the naval might of this country; (2) an isolationist policy, forbidding all exports of our commodities to belligerent nations; (3) a cash-and-carry policy whereby those who wish to buy our goods may come to our shores, pay cash, and assume all risks incident to travel on the high seas with belligerent destinations.

The McReynolds bill adopts the principle of cash and carry and then throws it out of the window by granting the President discretionary power to place our trade with belligerents on such a basis. The McReynolds bill does not stop American nationals from traveling on the vessels of a belligerent nation. Instead, it gives the President the power to prohibit such travel. This McReynolds bill provides the opportunity for us, as a neutral country, to expand our production and to develop a huge trade with belligerent nations which will again lead us either to war or to the now famous economic cycle of "boom or bust", or both. This bill does not prohibit American vessels, loaded with cargoes of American, belligerent, or neutral origin, from entering war zones. Actually, it leaves open every one of the avenues which led us into the late World War.

I want it perfectly understood that I do not distrust the ability or motives of our great President. He wants peace, but he is no more infallible than the Chief Executives we have had in the past or that we will have in the future. Because I love our President, and will always render my allegiance to our duly elected Executives, I oppose these grants of broad discretionary powers which, if mistakenly used or used too late, would shatter our dreams of peace and throw us once more into the hell of a modern war.

The first provision of section 4 grants to the President the power to restrict the shipment of articles and commodities except arms, ammunitions, and implements of war in such manner as he may see fit. These restrictions might be placed on anything under the sun. They might be on asbestos, bamboo, bromine, hides, cotton, iodine, soap, or wax. We do not regard any of these comodities as being munitions of war, yet under the British rules of the last war they were contraband. The very enactment of an embargo on such commodities might well be a distinctly unneutral act. Let me set up a hypothetical case. Suppose A and B are at war and our President should establish an embargo on cotton, leather, and steel. A might need all three of these commodities, while B might need only one. Therefore, by depriving A of these commodities we would be playing into the hands of B. The loss of self-preservation and self-interest would bring about an inevitable retaliation.

If you will take the time to read over the British lists of contraband and conditional contraband, you will see that there is scarcely anything left for us to export without running the risk of having those exports either seized or destroyed. If our citizens retain title to food, clothing, iron, steel, copper, and all other things now claimed to be of contraband nature, the belligerent with the greatest sea power will seize those shipments and the belligerent with the lesser sea power will destroy them by submarine or aerial attack. These are conditions whose existence has been proven, and you cannot enact a policy which is purely ideal but is supposed to operate in a world of realities.

If we are to escape another war we must adopt a policy whereby we say to all countries, "If you get into war there is only one way you can secure our goods: you must come to our shores, pay cash, and run your own risks on the high seas." The reasonableness of that proposal is based upon two uncontrovertable facts: First, we must have cash, because we cannot finance other countries' wars without ourselves becoming involved in those wars; second, we cannot ship goods without endangering American lives and property, the loss of either of which would provide a basis or motive for our casting off all neutrality to take on a belligerent character.

Our present law provides that any American national who travels on the vessel of a belligerent nation does so at his own risk. The bill we now have before us does not even do that much. Instead, it places upon our Government the responsibility of those citizens until such time as the President may see fit to forbid such travel within limitations which he may prescribe. Unless we can make the prohibition of travel upon belligerent vessels simultaneously with the establishment of neutrality we can well expect another Lusitania disaster. The fact that the Lusitania was not sunk until May 7, 1915, 10 months after the beginning of the World War, does not preclude the possibility of a similar tragedy 1 day or 10 days after the next war begins. Insofar as humanly possible, we must prevent the loss of American lives during periods of future neutrality.

My colleagues, with these closing words let me urge you to consider the provisions of this legislation, not from the standpoint of tradition and pure idealism but from the standpoint of experience and cold facts. Let us establish a neutrality act that will take advantage of every possibility of maintaining a perpetual and blessed peace. Let us not choose profits today which will bring us neither profits nor peace tomorrow. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON] such time as he may desire.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, at one time war could be waged with profit, now no gain can equal its cost. There are no noncombatants; war embraces all. Its savage brutality, its cost in indescribable horror to men, women, and children, and its utter futility far eclipse any imaginable economic benefit that might appear to accrue to either a participant or to a neutral nation.

Our present neutrality law was, and is, a declaration to the world that the United States cannot be used as a base of supplies for war purposes, but a wide loophole was uncovered a few weeks ago when the State Department found it could not legally refuse approval of a license to a New Jersey dealer in war supplies to export second-hand airplanes and engines to a warring faction in Spain.

A change in the law to include those engaged in civil war in Spain was made on January 6, 1937, by a joint resolution making it unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States or any of its possessions, or to export to a foreign country for transshipment to Spain, or for the use of either of the opposing parties during the present internal conflict there; and, in my opinion, wider discretionary powers should be given the Chief Executive in order that new and unforeseen circumstances can be dealt with as they arise in the rapidly changing world of today. We can ill afford to jeopardize our friendly relations with the world through the lack of authority to deal summarily and effectively with an individual or a nation over a point of law embarrassing to the general policy we have assured the world is ours.

Our neutrality law provides that when a declaration of war is made by one nation against another, financial aid and shipments of arms and munitions automatically cease; and our citizens are warned that they travel on vessels of belligerents at their own risk. Munitions of war are difficult to define and it has been suggested that all commodities such as wheat, cotton, steel, and oil should be considered contraband. It is my belief that the President should be given the power to say if and when such materials should be placed under an embargo; an ironclad law might work toward the destruction of our Nation, as well as of civilization itself. If wars were waged between two nations only, the problem would be less difficult, but with the alinement of a dozen nations against a like number, our position would be that of almost complete isolation if all trade with belligerents is prohibited. Such legislation might easily too narrowly restrict our course of action in the event of war or threatened war.

Mr. Chairman, in the case of commodity exports, let us not put up barriers to world trade, but rather be free to sell our wheat or cotton or oil to those who have the cash to pay for it, and the facilities to transport it to their shores, and that at their own risk. Let us lower international trade barriers by peaceful negotiations, and avoid the disastrous trend toward national self-sufficiency, which invites force by nations to secure that which they need, rather than to secure it by peaceful trade. Durable peace cannot rest upon force; it must rest upon common sense and goodwill.

The strengthening of the temporary neutrality law which expires May 1 is well provided for in House Joint Resolution 242, which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. As stated in the report accompanying the resolution, under section 3, it would include civil strife when it exists in a foreign state and whenever the President finds that such armed conflict is of such magnitude or is being conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States to said foreign state would threaten or endanger the peace of the United States. When such conditions arise the President shall proclaim such fact and thereafter it is made unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war, from any place in the United States, or possessions of the United States, to any such state or to any other state for transshipment to, or for use in, the state named in the proclamation.

As to the export of other articles and materials, it provides that whenever the President concludes it is necessary to protect our neutrality and our commerce he has the authority to define such articles and materials as he may think necessary to protect our Government and prohibit American vessels transporting the same to belligerents. Furthermore, a proclamation may be issued when deemed necessary to prohibit the exportation of commodities from the United States to belligerents or to any state wherein civil strife exists, or to any other state for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent state or such state wherein civil strife exists, until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign government, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. It also prohibits insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials the exportation of which is prohibited by the act, or on articles carried by an American vessel or aircraft contrary to subsection (a) of section 4 shall not be deemed an American interest therein, and no insurance policy issued on such articles or materials and no loss incurred thereunder shall be made a basis of any claim put forward by the Government of the United States.

It provides that any proclamation issued by the President shall apply equally to all belligerents, which is ordinarily called the cash-and-carry system; but the committee points out that the exportation of materials should not be effective unless it is necessary to maintain our neutrality or to protect the lives or commerce of our nationals, as many wars in Europe may occur between small countries which have no navies and in which there is no chance for us to become involved by the continuing of the shipment of our commodities. Hence, the President should have the right to determine this fact and put in force the prohibition of exportation of materials whenever he deems it necessary to keep us out of war. It was further held that he should have the power to prescribe in his proclamation such limitations on the shipment of commodities of war, because war may be carried on in the Pacific when our trade would not be in danger in the Atlantic; or it might be carried on in the Atlantic when our trade would not be in danger in the Pacific; or it might be carried on in some islands in the possession of some European country where the war was not being fought.

Section 5 is the law at the present time, with an amendment concerning civil strife and a further amendment under subsection (a) contains these words:

Or to solicit or receive any contribution for any such government, or political subdivision, or any person acting for or on behalf of such government or subdivision.

This section is a very important one because it deals with credits and the purchase and sale, and exchange, of bonds and securities, and so forth, and is designed to prevent the financing of foreign wars in this country.

Under section 8, the present law is amended to apply to armed merchant vessels as well as submarines. Section 9 changes the existing law so that when the President issues a proclamation that a war exists between two belligerent countries, it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to travel on any vessels of the state or states named in the proclamation, except under such limitations and in accordance with such rules and regulations that the President shall prescribe.

To supplement such legislation, we should encourage more conferences such as that held during the closing days of 1936 at Buenos Aires, which marked the beginning of a new era in the Western Hemisphere, made up of 21 American self-governing republics fully aware of their mutual dependence. It reflects a new democratic advance for control over interests which are the concern of all nations.

The eight-point program provides for the education and organization of the people of all nations for peace; for frequent conferences between representatives of nations; for the consummation of five well-known peace agreements; for a common neutrality policy among the American republics; for the pursuit of a liberal policy of commerce; for recognition of the principle of practical international cooperation to restore many indispensable relationships between nations; for strengthening of international law; and for observance of agreements and treaties between nations.

It has been truthfully said that before a war is conceivable there must be something to fight about—an issue. And that issue, broadly speaking, is the outcome of a series of maneuvers by which the people of one nation are brought into position of opposition to another. The maneuvering is not done by the people themselves. Collectively and as individuals, they have little, if anything, to do with the slow and subtle and tortuous shiftings of international relationships. That task, very properly, they leave to their governments. Their interests are directed to the more prosaic task of earning a living. The maneuvering is done by those little groups of men we call governments. These little groups seek constantly and naturally to gain supposed advantages of one sort or another for their own nationals. Out of their efforts to enlarge or to strengthen or to maintain the interests committed to their charge, the people they represent are gradually maneuvered into positions which cannot be easily surrendered. If the process continues, sooner or later an agreement between these little groups becomes impossible. Then, on the ground that their lives and property are somehow involved and endangered, these people, roused by every power of organized appeal and propaganda, are ordered under arms, and war follows. The little groups make the issue. The little groups declare the war. The people they control find themselves at the critical moment substantially helpless. And so as individuals, loyally and patriotically, they accept the decision and go out to pay the bills of war with their bodies in the hope that if not they, then those who come after them, may reap a benefit in some measure proportionate to its cost.

Therefore, the program developed at Buenos Aires to educate the people of the 21 American republics for peace, and for frequent conferences between their representatives and the exchange of views, ideas, and information, will awaken both the governments and the people to the need to advance the level of civilization and peace.

That the people of the United States are aware of the danger of another war is evidenced by the exhaustive studies many groups are making as to the causes of war and the best methods to pursue to avoid it. As an example of the recommendations made by such groups as labor, farm bureau, farm women's organization, League of Women Voters, Lions' Club, Kiwanis Club, Council of Churches, Christian Youth Council, and college and university organizations, I wish to quote here a communication I have received from the Sedgwick County (Kans.) Peace Council, which is worthy of serious consideration:

Neutrality legislation: We recommend neutrality legislation making mandatory at the outbreak of war an embargo on all arms, ammunition and implements of war, on loans and credits, and other essential war materials to belligerent countries.

National defense policy: We demand immediate reduction of the excessive expenditures for armaments and military forces—at least 20 percent for the next fiscal year.

We ask that legislation be enacted providing (1) for a revision of our military and naval policy as will result in a program based solely on protection of our soil against invasion and (2) for a reorganization and consolidation of the War and Navy Departments to insure the retention of only those means and methods of action that are needed to carry out this policy.

We recommend the continuance of the policy established by the Washington Conference of 1922 that there be no further fortification of our island possessions in the western Pacific.

We support the principle of the Nye-Kvale bill calling for elimination of the compulsory requirement from military training courses in civil educational institutions. We also urge the cessation of government aid to all military training in high schools.

Easing of international tensions: We recommend such easing of international trade tensions and stabilization of currencies as will facilitate world peace. We urge that Congress reenact legislation authorizing the Department of State to enter into reciprocal trade agreements with other nations.

Nationalization of the munitions industry and taxing the profits out of war: We recommend legislation to transfer the manufacture of arms, ammunition, and implements of war from private to national ownership.

We recommend a prohibition on the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war in time of peace as well as in time of war.

We recommend the passage of a drastic tax measure dealing with war profits as outlined by the Nye committee bill introduced in the last Congress.

International cooperation in the settlement of disputes: We favor the extension of peace machinery on the American continent.

We recognize the moral and political obligations of the United States to effectuate the Kellogg Pact by efforts to remove fundamental economic tensions making for war and urge prompt efforts in preparation for a world conference for general economic appeasement.

We approve the stand taken by the Democratic and Republican platforms of 1932 concerning the obligations of the United States to consult in case of a threatened violation of the Kellogg Pact and in favor of adherence to the World Court.

We favor American membership in the League of Nations on the terms of the Pope resolution introduced in the last Congress.

Now, Mr. Chairman, peace cannot be assured by the action of any one people alone; therefore we must, at the same time, plan for our defense and security should another world war come, and that plan should include the mobilization of man-power, and industrial, agricultural, economic, educational, and labor power. The War Department has conducted a study as to how industry can best serve the Government and the Nation in the time of emergency.

Secretary of War Woodring has said: To keep this country at peace it is imperative that we maintain our armed forces in a state of sufficient preparation capable of defending this Nation against aggression and thus give it that security which is a potent factor in the maintenance of peace. * * * I know that our people abhor war. I also know that the Army, knowing the implications and horrors of war, is a strong advocate of peace. It has no voice in making our laws. It does not shape our foreign policy. It has no voice in plunging the Nation into war. It always stands for service to the people whether in peace or war. It is a powerful protective influence acting as a barrier against war. * * * In the development of our plans for national protection the American people are entitled to be informed that in a general way we now know the resources of the country and how they can best be utilized; that industry is acquainted with our requirements and knows what it may have to produce; that the War Department has a thorough appreciation of modern supply preparedness and recognizes that in defense preparation the "strategy of personnel" depends as never before on the "strategy of material."

Mr. Chairman, the plan involves "problems relating to industrial and economic affairs which must be solved. The more important of these problems are to mobilize material, labor, and capital for the support of the fighting forces; to protect industry and the civil population from unnecessary deprivations; to control industrial and commercial relations with neutral and allied nations; to arrange the importation of needed supplies; to arrange the exportation of surpluses; and to interfere with and damage the enemy in every way possible."

And so our neutrality policy, on the one hand, and the mobilization of industry if war comes may involve some loss of profit to some of our citizens. It may not find favor among the manufacturers of munitions and of supplies for belligerents, but loss of profit is not comparable to loss of lives and the suffering occasioned by war. A repetition of the mistakes of the World War period must not be made, and the mobilization of the Nation will eliminate one of the causes of war—the ability of men to profiteer.

The situation in Europe and the Far East is grave, but a general conflict may yet be avoided, and until it is determined that hope for world peace is futile, we must enforce the cessation of all trade in arms with belligerents, and work for the removal of barriers to trade with nations at peace. Economic isolation is not a protection against war; in fact, those nations of the world who most nearly approach that state are now menacing world peace. Peaceful negotiation and commercial ties making nations more dependent upon one another must be encouraged.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, were it not for the lessons we learned in the World War, the time of the Congress would not be taken in considering this piece of legislation. It is with the hope that it will prevent future wars, or at least have some beneficial result upon keeping this country out of war, that the Committee on Foreign Affairs has brought this legislation to the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, there is a provision in this bill which the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] discussed a while ago, on which we find a great many people have decidedly opposite views. That is the discretionary power granted to the President of the United States under the language of the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to the House. It simply gives to the President of the United States discretionary power to declare embargoes upon commodities that may be used in the furtherance of war by a belligerent country. That is the extent of it. There are many things that could be enumerated that might be beneficial to a certain country in carrying on war against another nation, and from time to time there are certain inventions that are invented by mankind that might not be known today and might not be known when war broke out between foreign countries. It is absolutely necessary that we give discretionary power to somebody who can from time to time, under a certain state of facts, declare embargoes upon those commodities.

It has been suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] that we are giving power to the President to declare an embargo upon American shipping in this country under the provisions of this bill. Let me say that if it becomes necessary, in order to maintain the peace and neutrality of this Nation, then I declare to you that we should have an absolute embargo upon American shipping in this country. What right have those who are interested in the merchant marine, what right have the shipping interests of this country to say that we must sacrifice the lives of the men of this country in order that we may maintain the shipping interests of the country? What right have these exporters of materials and commodities which might be embargoed by the President to say that we must sacrifice the lives of the boys of this country in order to carry on commerce?

There is no one who appreciates any more than I do the necessity of maintaining the commerce of the country, so long as we can do it and maintain peace with other nations. I am not unmindful that an embargo might be declared against the agricultural products which we produce, as well as automobiles and other commodities, in the event the President should think that the peace of our Nation should be threatened by their export; but when we give them the right to come to this country, as this bill provides, to bring their own money and to come after it in foreign ships or in ships where they take their own risk, then we are not endangering the peace and lives and property of this country, and at the same time we are not impairing our foreign commerce.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. BIERMANN. Does the gentleman not think there is slight danger of bringing the war to our very shores by this sort of cash-and-carry policy?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I do not; because under the bill the President has the right to declare certain restrictions as to the use of our ports by foreign countries. I think that the ships which come here would naturally come on a peaceful mission, insofar as this country is concerned.

Mr. VOORHIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS. Is it not true that the alternative to that policy is for the United States to undertake to convoy vessels into the war zone? In other words, you have to take your choice between the one or the other. If you are not ready to take this cash-and-carry policy, then you must necessarily, on the other hand, go to the extent of being willing to convoy the goods.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Absolutely. That is a point that I think endangers the peace attitude of this country more than any other one thing.

When we undertake to transport our goods to belligerent countries we are placed in a position where our vessels are likely to be sunk, and if our ships are sunk and lives of our citizens are lost then we find ourselves in the position of declaring war against the country causing our loss and we do it to maintain the freedom of the seas. That gets us right back to the proposition argued a little while ago of surrendering the freedom of the seas. We do not surrender anything whatever in the way of freedom of the seas under the provisions of the McReynolds bill except that we say to our vessels that we are not going to invade the territory and war zones of those countries engaged in war. We will carry our commerce to those people when they are at peace, but when they become engaged in war we leave it to them to come and get the products of this country if they desire them with the exception of arms, ammunition, and actual implements of war, which, under the terms of the bill, cannot be exported to a belligerent in any manner when the President has issued a proclamation that there exists a state of war.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. The gentleman is making a very informative statement. I take it from his remarks that he prefers the McReynolds bill to the Senate bill.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Absolutely. I think it is far better because it leaves discretion in the President to say when a state of war exists and when the peace of this country is threatened. Except when the peace of our country is threatened we should have the right to carry on our peaceful commerce with other nations even though they may be involved in war. The provisions of the Pittman bill leaves no discretion whatever with the President but when a state of war exists requires an absolute embargo upon all commodities.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman think the McReynolds bill enacts a policy similar to the nonintercourse acts of the Jefferson administration?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. To a certain extent. I think it declares the policy of this country to be one of peace with all nations. It says not only to the strong nations but as well to the smaller nations that by the passage of this bill we are laying down a certain policy, the policy that we are not going to take part in the troubles of other nations. They are, therefore, warned, and should be guided by the policy we are enacting at this particular time.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Would the gentleman say that the successive steps taken under the Jefferson administration—and Jefferson, I think, was animated certainly by a desire to keep this country from becoming involved in war—would the successive steps of nonimports, embargo, and the nonintercourse act not follow, and would there not again be taken corresponding retaliatory measures such as were taken by England and France and such as are represented by the Berlin decree and the Milan decree and by the orders in council.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. The circumstances at this particular time are very different. It is a time of peace and we are not doing anything that would require retaliatory measures in taking this action at this time. We are indicating by every possible and conceivable act that it is our desire to keep this country from becoming involved in conflicts in other countries. I cannot conceive why they should want to take retaliatory action against us.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think that might be true if we were adopting a fixed policy, but as I understand the bill, particularly sections 4 (a) and (b), we are not adopting a fixed neutrality policy but are lodging discretionary power in the Executive, and the policy may change from time to time during the course of a war.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. In answer to the gentleman's question, I may say that I think it is absolutely necessary that some one person be left with discretionary power to say when certain conditions exist and to say when the peace of this country is threatened. It all goes to the proposition that if the peace of our country is not threatened we want to maintain and carry on commerce with these other nations and in that way dispose of our commodities and maintain our export trade and carry on in a general way; but when the Chief Executive, exercising the discretion lodged in him by the language of the McReynolds bill, decides and declares that the peace of our country is threatened, then the embargo goes into effect.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does not the gentleman think that such a policy, that of declaring that the peace of this country is threatened, amounts practically to an act of hostility and is, in effect, a declaration of war? I do not think such power should be given by Congress to any one man.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I do not. I disagree with the gentleman in that respect, because in laying down the policy by the passage of this bill we are giving notice to every nation that if it becomes involved in strife with another nation or in civil strife of such intensity that it threatens the peace of this country that we are going to place embargoes upon commodities generally as well as an absolute embargo upon arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. And if in the application of that discretionary policy it becomes necessary sooner or later to adopt a policy that will affect one nation or the other, that is effectually choosing the side that we will favor when we become involved?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I do not think so.

Mr. FERGUSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman made the statement that we would give warning to the nations that there would be an embargo on products if they became embroiled in war. Does not the gentleman think that warning will have the effect of nations trading with some other source of supply in peacetime, knowing that their source will be shut off in case they become embroiled in a war?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I do not. I think the nations more or less prepare for war in time of peace, just like we should do by building up a strong navy and building up a strong aircraft force. I believe they are going to come here and get our goods, and our vessels will carry the goods in time of peace in preparation for war, and I do not think it will interfere with our trade a great deal except at the particular times the other countries are engaged in a state of war or civil strife.

Mr. FERGUSON. The gentleman knows that commodities such as wheat and cotton are bought on future-delivery contracts. If a nation were anticipating war and knew this provision was going into effect, undoubtedly they would not make a purchase which involved future delivery, to be carried in American bottoms from the United States, when they knew this provision was in effect.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. That might be true, but I think they will come over here and get these goods and prepare for war, just like all the countries of the world usually do.

Mr. PACE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. PACE. If the gentleman were engaged in an industrial plant, and there was a grocery store that gave notice they would not advance groceries to any person out on strike, do you believe you would establish credit relations with that grocer while you were at work?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. To be perfectly frank with the gentleman, I do not desire to establish credit with any grocery store or anything else, and I think it would be fine if we adopted a cash policy in our trade relations with foreign countries insofar as our Government is concerned.

Mr. PACE. Is not that exactly analogous to the proposition the gentleman has just put forth?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I do not think so.

Mr. Chairman, there are many provisions of the bill I should like to discuss but shall not have the time to do so. I do want to call the attention of the House to section 5 of the bill as amended. It provides that when the President shall have issued a proclamation that a state of war or civil strife exists it shall thereafter be unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent state or states wherein civil strife exists, or to make any loan or extend any credit to any such government, or to solicit or receive any contribution for any such government or political subdivision. The chairman of our committee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] stated that he would assume full responsibility for this provision, and I want to say that I think it is a fine provision. Witnesses came before our committee and admitted that hundreds of thousands of dollars had been and were now being collected in this country for the benefit of one side of the civil strife in Spain. If this Nation is to remain neutral in the Spanish controversy which is now raging, and if this Nation is to remain neutral in other conflicts, we must compel our citizens to remain neutral by prohibiting them from collecting money for the benefit of either side of a controversy.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that it is a difficult matter, if not entirely impossible, to enact legislation that will keep this country out of future wars, but I do believe the bill which we are considering will go a long way toward preventing this Nation from becoming involved in another war. The war clouds are flying freely in many sections of the world today, and in urging the passage of this bill, even though we may lose a little foreign commerce, I think it far better that a few individuals lose a little profit than to see this country lose billions of dollars in fighting another war, and see the young men of this country slaughtered, as was witnessed during the World War. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 18 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LONG].

Mr. LONG. Mr. Chairman, your Committee on Foreign Affairs, to whom has been assigned the task of preparing and presenting for your consideration a bill establishing a permanent neutrality policy of the United States, has labored long and hard, and is bringing to you today in the form of a bill its suggestions and recommendations.

Whatever may be the attitude for or against neutrality legislation, I am satisfied that we are all agreed on the fact that it is a very difficult matter to bring forth a set of rules which will guarantee to us peace for the future in a world on fire with temperamental and racial prejudices.

This bill has for its objective but one purpose, and that is to keep the United States out of other peoples' wars.

To arrive at the suggestions and recommendations contained in this proposed bill, and realizing that the successful operation of the bill affects the lives and property of every citizen of the United States, your committee has conducted long hours of hearings and listened to the testimony of many recognized experts in the field, and has given the matter individual, conscientious, and prayerful thought.

We, as your committee, have endeavored to produce a bill for your consideration which, in our opinion, will serve the purpose of keeping America out of war and will at the same time, so far as is safely possible, permit our trade with foreign nations to continue.

With your indulgence, Mr. Chairman and ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I will confine my remarks to section 4 of the proposed bill, which is commonly known as the commodity section. This section is designed to place restrictions upon commodities other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war. The other features of the proposed bill will be dealt with by other members of the committee and various other speakers on this subject.

The main controversial question in connection with section 4 of the proposed bill has to do with mandatory versus discretionary legislation.

The bill now before you for consideration accords a much wider latitude of discretion to the executive department than is urged by those who favor mandatory legislation.

The proponents of mandatory legislation, which places the executive department under absolute and fixed rules regardless of where or what countries may be at war, overlook the fact that there are several highly important economic features which must be considered in any neutrality legislation.

They either lose sight of, or do not recognize, that the mandatory legislation they propose would in every instance completely retire our merchant marine from service, so far as belligerent countries are concerned.

Also, they overlook, or fail to recognize, the fact that in America we are by no means independent. There are many articles of outstanding importance to our economic welfare which are not produced in the United States and for which we must look to foreign lands for our supply.

Outstanding among these are rubber and tin. Further than this, the proponents of mandatory legislation either lose sight of or fail to recognize the fact that our domestic and economic prosperity is dependent in no small degree upon our ability to dispose of our surplus American production of many commodities in foreign lands.

A striking example of this was the retaliation program instituted by foreign countries against the operation of the protective tariff bill of 1930. Foreign countries, in retaliation against our abnormally high tariff, raised their duties against American products to the point of exclusion. As a result, we in America were swamped with an oversupply of our own agricultural and manufactured products, which was no inconsiderable factor toward producing the ruinous agricultural prices of 1932 and 1933.

In order that the important economic factors just recited may be given full consideration, there has been inserted in the bill now before you a latitude of discretion in the President in the enforcement of subsections (a) and (b) of section 4.

Those who seek mandatory legislation under subsection (a) would absolutely prohibit the shipment of specified contraband articles in American ships regardless of what countries were at war or where the war might be being fought.

The discretion given to the President in the bill now before you would accord to the Chief Executive the authority to permit American vessels to transport contraband commodities to belligerent countries where there was absolutely no risk in transportation. This feature would permit our American merchant marine, which this country has spent millions of dollars to develop, to continue in operation to belligerent countries and thus maintain our trade with those countries where it can be done without risk.

As an example of such commerce, might I not suggest the possibility of a war between two countries neither of which possessed navies. In the absence of any sea power it is apparent that there could be no risk in shipment of contraband goods in American vessels to such countries.

Subsection (a), as well as subsection (b), is flexible, and rulings thereunder issued by the executive department can be revised from time to time to meet new conditions as they might arise. That is the purpose of the discretionary feature.

Under subsection (b) we find that whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation under section 3 of the act, and he shall thereafter find that the placing of further restrictions on exportation of commodities from the United States to belligerents is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace or neutrality of the United States, or protect the lives and commerce of the United States, he shall so proclaim, and it shall thereafter be unlawful, except under such limitation as the President shall prescribe, to export or transport from the United States to any belligerent state any of the enumerated commodities until all American interest in said commodities shall be divested.

This is the so-called cash-and-carry feature of the act. Here again, the proponents of mandatory legislation would leave no discretion in the Chief Executive as to the enforcement of the subsection.

They would make this ruling so cold that, when the President had once enumerated the articles of contraband, they could not leave this country destined to a belligerent nation without complete divesting of title of all American interest regardless of what countries were at war or where the war was being fought. Further, they would give no consideration as to whether or not there were any transportation dangers connected with the shipments. An absolute mandatory provision under subsection (b) would positively forbid deliveries being made to belligerent buyers in their own countries.

In other words, under a mandatory provision, it would be absolutely required that the belligerent buyers come to our shores with their money in their hands, buy and pay for American products, and carry them away in their own ships regardless of what may be the extenuating circumstances or the surrounding conditions.

Such a drastic measure as this would stifle all American trade with belligerent nations and result in dire consequences at home, which I will shortly endeavor to point out.

Again here, may I not draw your attention to the fact that mandatory restrictions are necessary only where there is danger in transportation. Again using the illustration of a war between two countries neither of which has any sea power, there could be no danger in transportation; and if there is no danger to transportation, what possible excuse can be offered for stifling our trade with belligerent nations in commodities other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war?

It is to meet such conditions as I have pointed out that the President has been accorded a latitude of discretion in the enforcement of subsection (b) just referred to.

In shaping any permanent legislation dealing wtih neutrality, we are at the very best in a novel field and must take into account the economic result on our own country of the enforcement of such legislation.

The legislation must necessarily be framed with the objective to keep us out of war and at the same time accomplish this with as little interference with our foreign trade as is safely possible.

Were these restrictions to be drawn too tightly, we would inevitably be confronted with the same disastrous result as was met by the United States under the embargoes imposed by Thomas Jefferson.

The American people may be ready to accept sacrifices of trade and profits whereby to continue trade would be to risk war, but they would not long tolerate a sweeping prohibition applied indiscriminately in situations where its necessity was not obvious.

The United States has no monopoly on materials useful in war, and an embargo on our exports would merely divert our normal trade to our competitors. The only commodity useful in war in which the United States production equals 50 percent of total world production is oil. There are ample supplies of oil outside of the United States—in Russia, Rumania, Mexico, Venezuela, and the middle East—from which belligerent nations could easily acquire their supply. As for copper, iron, cotton, and a long list of other key war materials, the supply outside the United States is ample.

So long as the world is not dependent upon the United States for these key materials of war, and the United States has by mandatory embargo denied the sale of such of these products as are produced at home to belligerent nations, these nations would promptly look to other producing countries for their supply, and the American trade in such commodities would be lost. Trade of any kind once lost is difficult to regain.

Such trade lost must result in a curtailment of American production with its consequent unemployment, both of labor and capital, and were this unnecessarily done, the result would be the rising of a war party in the United States and its consequent demand for relief. Such demand could easily ripen into sufficient strength to throw our country into war from pressure from within even though we may have evaded war from attack from without.

In the earlier part of these remarks I directed your attention to the fact that America is not self-sustaining, that many articles necessary to our economic existence must come from foreign countries. In fact, due to the drought years of 1934 and 1936 and the destruction of crops by insect infestation, it has been necessary to import from other lands an enormous amount of agricultural products and livestock that our own people might be supplied with the fundamental foodstuffs to sustain life.

The institution and application of drastic, unreasonable, and unnecessary embargoes as an incident to the attempted enforcement of American neutrality might easily result in retaliation by which foreign lands upon whom we depend might embargo their products against us. An embargo upon rubber would bring to a complete standstill the entire automobile industry of the United States. An embargo on tin would destroy the entire canning industry of our country. Without even mentioning the result of an embargo on foodstuffs, I leave it entirely to your imagination as to what would be the result of the complete cessation of both the automobile and the canning industry of America.

In peacetime the storm of protest from the owners of these industries and from the millions of workers who are employed therein would create a wave of public sentiment that would set at naught any neutrality measures that Congress or the President might see fit to adopt, and in wartime the result would be the complete collapse of our naval and military forces.

Those who attack the discretionary features of neutrality legislation hold to the contention that it is a delegation of war-making power by the Congress to the President. In other words, that by placing in the neutrality bill provisions which vest the President with certain discretionary authority transfers the power to declare war from the Congress to the Chief Executive.

May I not draw your attention to the fact that nowhere in this proposed bill will you find anything that can possibly be construed as conferring upon the President the power to declare war.

As a matter of fact, the Chief Executive already has a far greater latitude of discretion than is accorded him in this proposed bill. Mr. Allen W. Dulles and Mr. Hamilton Fish Armstrong, recognized authorities on international law and neutrality, in commenting on this matter in their book, entitled "Can We Be Neutral?" have this to say:

> No legislation by Congress is required. To adopt such a policy lies clearly within the province of the Executive, which is authorized to conduct foreign relations. Nevertheless, if Congress by a bipartisan vote should express approval of this policy, this action would tend to establish it as a national policy rather than an expedient applied to a particular situation by one administration.

If the power is already vested in the Chief Executive to impose restrictions on trade to belligerents in time of war, then nothing that Congress could do by legislation would either add to or detract from the discretion which the President already has.

The President being vested constitutionally to deal with foreign countries has it in his power to do such acts from which war might ensue and no legislation could change the result.

Commenting further on the so-called cash-and-carry plan by which it is proposed to sell commodities, whether contraband or not, to any and all who are willing to "come and get it" and take it away with them, may I not be permitted to quote Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, recognized authority on international law. In commenting on the cash-and-carry plan, Mr. Baruch has this to say:

> Now, this is not neutrality—not by 20 sea miles. It amounts to giving active assistance to whatever nation has command of the seas.

Suppose that we were to enact this cash-and-carry policy and the result would be that the belligerent nation who had command of the seas supplied itself from the American reservoir to the exclusion of the belligerent who did not command the seas, the excluded belligerent would in such a case exert every means available, both fair and foul, to stop the basis of supplies to its enemy. This would arise both from the standpoint of self-preservation as well as to help to secure the defeat of its adversary.

The means used by the excluded belligerent could and would extend to the building up of sympathy for such nation among our own people through the medium of propaganda.

It has been very aptly said that a nation can be made neutral, but that its people cannot. Sympathies for one side or the other are bound to arise in the breast of every citizen. This was demonstrated less than 2 years gone in the Italian-Ethiopian conflict. Here we had the spectacle of two nations engaged in a war in which neither the United States nor its people had any direct interest, and yet it was the topic of conversation everywhere in our land and our people in sympathy took sides, either one way or the other, according to the dictates of their impressions and their consciences.

A sympathy such as this already existing could by the means of propaganda be inflamed to a degree that could easily result in internal and international disaster.

From people who have appeared before the committee and from the vast correspondence that has come to the desk of each member of the committee are suggestions of neutrality legislation that range all the way from an iron-bound, ironclad, inflexible mandatory act to no neutrality legislation at all. Your committee, in considering all these suggestions and after exhaustive research, has endeavored to bring forth a bill that will meet somewhere near a middle ground. We have endeavored to produce a bill designed to keep us out of other people's wars by taking into consideration our own economic factors as well as the temperament and sympathies of human beings, and we feel that the bill presented today for your approval meets those requirements. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 51, the neutrality bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal source of light and life, enter Thou into our lives and give us today life that is strong and triumphant, life that is full and free. Satisfy, we beseech Thee, our deep, unspoken longings with the revelation of the Christ, the Lord of sincerity and truth before whom all that is hollow and unreal shrivels up and is consumed. Increase in us the spirit of reality; help us fearlessly and honestly to seek for truth and to hearken to Thy challenge; cleanse us from all pride and prejudice, and purge out from our inmost souls whatever is unworthy, that in all our doings we may quit ourselves like men whom God indwells and ever find joy in the service of our country. We ask it in the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 12, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

LABOR CONDITIONS IN NEW JERSEY FACTORIES

Mr. MOORE. Mr. President, last week the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] referred to a couple of factories in New Jersey. I have here a letter from the commissioner of labor of the State of New Jersey, who made an examination of the conditions in certain factories referred to. I ask unanimous consent that his letter to me and the formal statement which he attaches to it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
Newark, N. J., March 12, 1937.

Hon. A. HARRY MOORE,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I was very much surprised and mortified by the statements of Senator WALSH, as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 26, 1937, with reference to alleged violations in New Jersey plants of conditions of labor prescribed under the Walsh-Healey Act. I was still more mortified when I saw an editorial in a Philadelphia paper quoting verbatim from the RECORD.

I immediately dispatched my inspectors for a check-up on conditions of the plants mentioned, and their reports, which I have rechecked, show conditions much better than those described in the RECORD.

As to Tippett & Wood, of Phillipsburg, N. J., I have no apologies. It is an excellent plant and has been doing Government work for 40 years.

As to the Woodbine Borough Clothing Co., of Woodbine, N. J., violations were uncovered which I do not consider serious. The two minors employed were employed not in violation of the New Jersey law. As you know, minors above 16 years require no working certifiates in New Jersey. As to this contract, I assure you the State department of labor was not informed by the United States Department of Labor that the Woodbine Borough Clothing Co. was doing Government work. This particular contract does not appear in any of the circulars issued by the United States Department of Labor and received by the New Jersey Department of Labor.

The Reliable Cotton Felt Co., of Hoboken, N. J., apparently had people working partly on Government contracts and on private work 9 hours a day and 54 hours a week. This contract has been completed and the firm does not contemplate any further work for the Government.

Incidentally it may interest you to know that this plant was ordered closed by me not so long ago for failure to install proper exhaust system to render the processes less hazardous to workers. This company disregarded my closing order and continue to work a few days, for which violation there is now a penalty action pending in the Hudson County Circuit Court for the collection of a penalty in the sum of $1,000. They have since complied with the requirements laid down by the department of labor.

I assure you that the State department of labor has not failed in any respect in its cooperation with the Federal Government. It has made 19 investigations and has 10 more pending. Of course, it must be notified by the United States Government of the contracts to render service to the Federal Government.

All in all, Senator, you should not consider the "swat-in-the-eye" as at all serious. I regret exceedingly that it was occasioned at all. I attach hereto a formal statement as answer to the allegations of Senator WALSH for your use as you see fit.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN J. TOOHEY, JR.,
Commissioner of Labor.

Alleged violations of conditions and hours of labor under the Walsh-Healey Act, as stated by Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts, and published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 26, 1937, on page 2059, with special reference to New Jersey, have been checked on immediately.

A very thorough inspection of the plant of Tippett & Wood, of Phillipsburg, N. J., manufacturing buoys for the United States Government, showed the plant in excellent condition, free of violations of the New Jersey statutes.

The plant is engaged in steel construction work and is of necessity large and open and the men are permitted to warm themselves at strategically placed salamanders, which are definitely not "garbage cans", and not "oil drums", as alleged. Washrooms are steam heated day and night and the water is brought from the boiler room hot.

Incidentally, Tippett & Wood have been doing Government work for 40 years. The Government contract work is segregated in one part of the plant and the men on these contracts are limited to 40 hours a week.

As to the Woodbine Borough Clothing Co., of Woodbine, N. J., where it was alleged that 15 girls under the child-labor age fixed in the Walsh-Healey Act were engaged on Government contract, and where workers had not received wages since January 11, and where no time records were kept, a thorough inspection of this plant revealed that only two minors, one 16 and one 17, were employed on Government work. The wages are currently paid.

There was, however, a violation of failure to keep record of hours of piece workers, and two women were found who had worked more than the weekly limit for such work for women under the New Jersey statutes. Prosecutions for these violations have been ordered at once.

In this connection it must be stated that the State department of labor was not informed of this particular contract with the Woodbine Borough Clothing Co., and, of course, could not make an inspection of conditions of work to force compliance with the Walsh-Healey Act. As minors under the New Jersey law, may be employed above the age of 16, there was no violation with reference to child labor under the New Jersey statute.

In the Reliable Cotton Felt Co., of Hoboken, N. J., an inspection by the department of labor disclosed that 15 employees worked 9 hours a day on a 54-hour-a-week basis, only part of this time being devoted to Government-contract work and the rest of the time to private work. Incidentally, the work under the Government contract has already been completed and a representative of this firm stated that it contemplates no further work under Government contract.

Time and a half was not paid for overtime.

The New Jersey State Department of Labor has cooperated with the United States Department of Labor to the fullest extent, and an immediate and constant check has been and is being kept on conditions of labor in all plants in this State reported as having contracts for the United States Government. To date this department has made 19 investigations of manufacturing plants doing Government work and has 10 more pending.

Of course, where the department is not informed of such contracts it cannot send its inspectors for a check-up on conditions for compliance with the requirements of the act.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Joint memorial to the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States requesting an appropriation for the construction of La Plata Reservoir Project No. 1

Whereas the La Plata River, a tributary of the San Juan and Colorado Rivers, is an interstate stream arising in the State of Colorado and flowing across the southern boundary of Colorado into the State of New Mexico to a junction with the San Juan River; and

Whereas some 5,000 or more acres of land lying along said La Plata River in the county of San Juan, State of New Mexico, were settled more than 50 years ago, being irrigated by waters from the La Plata River diverted from said river by direct diversion; and

Whereas about 30 years ago the Southern Ute Indian Reservation in the State of Colorado, lying along the La Plata River in the State of Colorado, was opened for settlement under limitations which required the settlers to take water from the La Plata River to their said lands, with the result that some 20,000 acres of land of said Southern Ute Indian Reservation were settled upon and placed under irrigation; and

Whereas the drainage of the La Plata River is from the south slopes of the La Plata Mountains with a quick and early run-off in the months of March, April, and May, with the result that the taking of water in Colorado by direct diversion has deprived the settlers in New Mexico of water during the months of June, July, August, and September, which is the growing season; and

Whereas heretofore and under an interstate compact the States of Colorado and New Mexico endeavored to solve said problem by entering into a solemn compact providing for rotation in the use of water during the crop season; and

Whereas said arrangement has not been satisfactory either to the settlers in New Mexico or Colorado, with the result that over 500 families who are dependent upon the waters of the La Plata River for their livelihood are now in a desperate financial condition and unable to earn a living upon their lands, because of a shortage of water; and

Whereas in an effort to solve said problem an application was made by the settlers in New Mexico and Colorado to the Works Progress Administration for an allotment of moneys to construct a storage reservoir at a site to be known as La Plata Reservoir Site No. 1, which said Works Progress Administration project, identified as Colorado State Serial No. 6–88, was approved for the construction of a dam on the La Plata River as being eligible under the provisions of the act by the Honorable Franklin Delano Roosevelt, President of the United States, on November 16, 1935, by Presidential letter no. 1018 under official project no. 65–84–1431, said Presidential letter being countersigned by the Comptroller General, November 25, 1935, under warranty no. 1009, in the amount of $553,295, which said sum became available for operations at the discretion of Mr. Paul D. Shriver, Works Progress Administrator for the State of Colorado; and

Whereas subsequent to the approval of the same a detailed survey of the proposed reservoir site was made by the Works Progress Administration, which estimate reduces the original estimate of $553,295 to $395,500, a saving of $157,795; and

Whereas due to the fact that said stream is an interstate stream and to the further fact that under the Works Progress Administration it is required that the contract or agreement be entered into between the settlers who are to benefit from the project for the repayment of a part of the cost of the project, which is impossible, due to the financial condition of the settlers and interstate complications; and

Whereas the construction of said project known as La Plata Reservoir No. 1, is feasible and economically sound, and is the key to the solution of the problem along the La Plata River in Colorado and New Mexico and will rehabilitate over 25,000 acres of fertile land by providing supplemental irrigation water, and the people who would benefit therefrom are in desperate need, and said project has the endorsement and approval of the State engineers of both the States of New Mexico and Colorado, and the Governor of New Mexico: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of New Mexico as follows, to wit:

First. The Legislature of the State of New Mexico does hereby memorialize and request of the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States to make available by direct appropriation, if it cannot be done otherwise, sufficient funds for the construction of a reservoir upon the La Plata River at the site known as La Plata Reservoir Site No. 1 in the State of Colorado.

Second. In event a direct appropriation cannot be made for the construction of this project, the Legislature of the State of New Mexico does hereby memorialize and request of the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States to make available by direct appropriation a sufficient sum which will permit the construction of this project by the Civilian Conservation Corps at a greater saving to the Federal Government, under the direction of the Army engineers of the United States Army.

Third. That copies of this memorial be mailed to the President of the United States and to each of our Senators and Representative in Congress, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate, to the Honorable Harry L. Hopkins, Works Progress Administrator, to the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, to the Honorable Robert Fechner, Director of the Civilian Conservation Corps, and to the Governor of the State of Colorado, the speaker of the House of Representatives of the State of Colorado, and the president of the Senate of the State of Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

To the honorable the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, respectfully represents that—

Whereas the Territory of Alaska contains more than 90,000,000,000 feet of spruce and hemlock timber, especially adapted to the manufacture of paper and paper products, especially newsprint, together with ample sources of water power for the manufacture of said raw material; and

Whereas the major part of said timber is within the limits of forest reserves, the control of which is entirely with the Government of the United States; and

Whereas such timber as aforesaid is sufficient to supply in perpetuity more than one-third of the demand for newsprint paper in the United States proper; and

Whereas only a small fraction of the mature timber contained within said forest reserves is now being utilized, hundreds of millions of feet thereof dying each year and being blown down by winds to the detriment of the standing and growing timber and to the great loss of the people of Alaska and of the United States; and

Whereas the greater part of the needs for newsprint paper in the United States is now being filled by importation from Canada, Russia, and the Scandinavian countries, no protection being afforded to domestic production by the tariff laws of the United States; and

Whereas a reasonable protective tariff on imports of such products would result in the development and utilization of such domestic timber with the consequent effect of the employment of large numbers of men at gainful occupation and the building up of industries and associated enterprises, both in Alaska and in those parts of the United States proper where stands of timber suitable for pulpwood or newsprint are found; and

Whereas the great need of the Territory of Alaska is year-round employment as distinguished from seasonal occupation afforded by the fishing industry, which at the present time employs the greater number of the inhabitants of the Territory for 3 or 4 months during the summertime; and

Whereas a bill was introduced by Senator C. C. Dill in the Seventy-third Congress of the United States which provided an embargo on foreign pulpwood and newsprint paper, and there is now a bill (H. R. 1548), by Delegate DIMOND, before Congress which is designed to protect and promote the development of the pulpwood industry in the United States:

Now, therefore, your memorialist prays that an act similar in object to the Dill bill be enacted to the end that the unemployed of the Territory of Alaska may through establishment of the pulp industry in this Territory be furnished gainful employment and that this Territory may be developed through the utilization of this great natural resource.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Congress of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Commerce, and to the Honorable Anthony J. Dimond, Delegate to Congress from Alaska:

Whereas a permanent population of nearly 2,000 people reside in that section of Alaska known as Bristol Bay and adjacent thereto, which population is engaged in the business of fishing for a livelihood; and, in addition thereto, a seasonal population of many thousands more come from the States to put up the salmon pack each summer; and

Whereas the fishing industry is of untold value to the above-mentioned fishing and transient population of Alaska, and to the United States as an industry; and

Whereas there is a gradual but a continuous and increasing encroachment of Japanese fishermen and fishing vessels upon the waters of said Bristol Bay and the Bering Sea; and

Whereas said Japanese fishermen, working on a low wage scale, and such Japanese fishing vessels operating beyond the jurisdiction of the United States Bureau of Fisheries, and not bound by or observing the rules and regulations of said Bureau, are able to pack and sell their fish products at reduced prices; and

Whereas such encroachment and methods constitute a serious menace to the Alaska fish supply and to the fishing industry and the domestic fish market of the United States; and

Whereas said fishing industry is of untold value to Alaska and to the United States and should be fostered, protected, and encouraged:

Now, therefore, your memorialist prays that the matter of this encroachment of Japanese fishermen upon the waters of Bristol Bay and the Bering Sea receive the consideration of Congress, so that either congressional action be taken, or an appropriate agreement be made to adjust the matter.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

Whereas the honorable ANTHONY J. DIMOND, Delegate to Congress from Alaska, has introduced in the House of Representatives of the United States now in session, H. R. 1504, providing for old-age allowances to Indians of the United States; and

Whereas we believe that this bill fairly reflects the views of a large majority of the people of this Territory upon the subject covered; and

Whereas the Indians and Eskimos in the Territory of Alaska have always been considered as wards of the United States Government, both by the courts and by the administration, and as such wards, the United States Government, through the Bureau of Education and the Bureau of Indian Affairs, has always assumed the burden of caring for them, and has furnished to the said Indians and Eskimos, education, hospitalization, dentistry, medical assistance, and relief: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Thirteenth Session of the Legislature of Alaska, That we heartily approve the provisions of said bill and respectfully request that the same be enacted into law; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this joint resolution be mailed to the honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, to the honorable President of the Senate, and to the honorable Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to the honorable ANTHONY J. DIMOND, Delegate to Congress from Alaska.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs:

To the honorable Congress and the honorable Secretary of the Interior of the United States:

Your memorialist, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in regular session assembled, respectfully represents:

Whereas the Federal Government by law appropriates money for schools "for and among the Indians in Alaska" by annual appropriation; and

Whereas the Federal Government pays tuition to public schools in the States for nontaxpaying Indians who are one-quarter or more native; and

Whereas the Federal Government controls most of the resources and more than 99 percent of the land in Alaska; and

Whereas the Territory of Alaska and the cities of Alaska have, since the year 1917, educated increasing numbers of native, now numbering more than 1,900 Indians and Eskimos of one-quarter or more native blood; and

Whereas the cost to the Territory of Alaska and the cities of Alaska has now assumed the proportions annually of approximately $220,000; and

Whereas the Department of Education of the Territory of Alaska has presented to the Office of Indian Affairs of the Department of the Interior a request for reimbursement for this education; and

Whereas the Office of Indian Affairs in its last budget included the sum of $220,000 for this reimbursement; and

Whereas the Budget Committee of the Federal Government refused to consider this item: Now, therefore,

Your memorialist, the Legislature of Alaska, respectfully prays that the sum of $220,000 be appropriated for the present fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1936, and ending June 30, 1937, to reimburse Alaska and the cities of Alaska for this eduction, and that a similar amount sufficient to pay for this education be appropriated annually to reimburse the Territory of Alaska and the cities in Alaska for the education of the Indians and Eskimos as the Federal Government now reimburses the public schools in the States for such services.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, favoring the enactment of legislation providing sufficient toll charges for the use of Panama Canal facilities to avoid a deficit, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. NYE.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, endorsing the recommendations of the President of the United States for the reformation and reorganization of the Federal judiciary, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. BYRNES.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the annual meeting of the Michigan-Washington Democratic Club at Washington, D. C., and the Women's International Union Label League, Local No. 586, of Dallas, Tex., favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a meeting of the Lawyers' Security League, New York City, N. Y., favoring the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, and any other legislation of a similar character, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by members of the Oregon State Bar, protesting against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate several memorials of sundry citizens of the State of New York, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or any other legislation of a similar character, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON. I present for appropriate reference a senate joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arkansas relating to the judiciary proposal.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint memorial memorializing the Congress and Senate of the United States to adopt the President's proposal to enlarge the Supreme Court

Whereas the President of the United States has proposed to the Congress that it enact legislation enlarging the membership of the Supreme Court; and

Whereas the President's proposal is in keeping with the ideals and the trend of democratic government in its effort to serve humanity rather than protected interests; and

Whereas the State legislatures of many States have by resolution endorsed the bill suggested by the President; and some have gone on record against it: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Arkansas (the House concurring therein), That we declare ourselves in favor of the President's proposal and that we do hereby memorialize the Congress and Senate of the United States and particularly the members of the Arkansas delegation in each House to work and vote for the passage of such legislation.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS—PRINTING IN RECORD

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I present a memorial from the lawyers of the city of San Francisco, which is numerously signed by Matt I. Sullivan, Garret W. McEnerney, and others. I should like to have the memorial, which remonstrates against the proposal to enlarge the Supreme Court, printed in the RECORD, if it be permissible. If it has been agreed that such matters may be so printed, I will be very glad to have printed the memorial presented by me. It is very short.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think there has been an understanding that only memorials from legislative bodies shall be printed in the RECORD, and that other petitions and memorials shall be noted in the RECORD.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If that be the understanding, I abide by it, Mr. President; but the memorial I present is from the lawyers of San Francisco, and I commend it for its restraint and its logical and able presentation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial presented by the Senator from California will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GREEN. I present for appropriate disposition a resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Rhode Island relating to the proposal to increase the membership of the United States Supreme Court, to which I made reference on Friday last.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate resolution requesting the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Rhode Island to vote against and to use their influence to defeat the proposed increase in the membership of the United States Supreme Court

Whereas bills to effect a reorganization of the judicial system of the United States have been introduced in the Congress of the United States; and

Whereas as part of said reorganization it is provided that the membership of the United States Supreme Court may be increased by six members; and

Whereas the proposal for said increase comes at a time when new appointees to said Supreme Court would almost immediately be called upon to make important decisions on constitutional questions; and

Whereas the preservation of the confidence of the people in the impartiality and independence of the Supreme Court is vitally important in American constitutional government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the State of Rhode Island requests the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Rhode Island to vote against and to use their influence to defeat the proposed increase in the membership of the United States Supreme Court; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized and directed to transmit duly certified copies of this resolution to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Rhode Island.

Mr. BYRNES. I present, for appropriate reference, a concurrent resolution endorsing the proposed plan of President Roosevelt relating to the Federal judiciary that has been adopted by the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution endorsing the proposed plan of President Roosevelt relating to the Federal judiciary

Whereas the President of the United States has recommended to the Congress certain measures to reform and reorganize the Federal judiciary; and

Whereas the said measures are desirable and proper and are designed and calculated to restrict the excessive powers of the United States Supreme Court and to enhance the powers of the people through their elective legislature and the Executive; and

Whereas the said reforms will enhance the speed and efficiency of the Federal courts; and

Whereas the people of the State of South Carolina and of the United States have endorsed the policies and principles espoused by the President of the United States by the most overwhelming vote of confidence in the history of the United States; and

Whereas the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina desires to commend the President of the United States for his courageous and patriotic action in proposing the said reformation and reorganization of the Federal judiciary and to assure him that the people of the State of South Carolina and their general assembly approve and endorse the said recommendations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina does hereby commend the President of the United States for his courageous and patriotic action in recommending the reformation and reorganization of the Federal judiciary; be it further

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina does hereby aporove and endorse the recommendations of the President of the United States for the reformation and reorganization of the Federal judiciary in the particulars specified in his message to the Congress on February 5, 1937; be it further

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina does hereby commend the Representatives and Senators from South Carolina in the Congress of the United States, who have given assurance of their support of the said recommendations of the President; be it further

Resolved, That the South Carolina delegation in Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby respectfully petitioned and urged to support the said recommendations of the President; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of representatives be, and he is hereby, directed forthwith to transmit copies of this resolution to His Excellency Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, to each Representative and Senator from South Carolina in the Congress of the United States, to the Clerk of the honorable House of Representatives of the United States, and to the Clerk of the honorable United States Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered on March 11, 1937, by Hon. Charlton B. Thompson, of Covington, Ky., a very distinguished and outstanding lawyer, on the proposal for judicial reform.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, it is very difficult for me to hear what is being said. May I inquire if my colleague presented a resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Rhode Island protesting against an increase in the membership of the United States Supreme Court as proposed by the President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he did.

Mr. GERRY. I ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the resolution be read. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, before the request is acted upon let me say that a few moments ago the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] presented a memorial, and it was ordered to be noted in the RECORD. I think that conforms probably to a criticism which I made last week with respect to the indefinite and indiscriminate publication of like documents relating to the President's plan for reorganization of the Federal judiciary.

However, a moment ago the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] offered a document for publication in the RECORD which, I think, is in the same category as the one offered by the Senator from California. The Senator from Kentucky asked that the document presented by him be printed in the RECORD, and permission was granted.

I am willing to enforce the rule and do my part in observing the rule, but I shall permit no discrimination. I am not saying that any was attempted, but if the long article or document presented by the Senator from Kentucky is to be published in the RECORD, then the memorial presented by the Senator from California must likewise be published.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. LOGAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McNARY. I yield first to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, my attention was not called to any exception to the rule. It is my intention to enforce the rule. Therefore, I suggest to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], if the matter which he submitted be not a resolution of a general assembly or legislative body, that he have it noted in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon and the Senator from Arkansas that he is informed by the Parliamentarian that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] asked unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD an address delivered by some gentleman in Kentucky.

Mr. McNARY. The document submitted by the Senator from California was signed by a representative list of reputable attorneys of San Francisco and elsewhere, relating to the same subject matter and falls within the same specifications as the speech made by some lawyer in Kentucky favoring the proposal to increase the membership of the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBINSON. We have been publishing in the RECORD speeches and addresses from various sources. No objection, so far as I have known, has been made to the publication of such addresses. My thought is that the rule of the Senate should govern in the matter. Objection may be made to the publication of any matter in the RECORD. I do not wish to be discriminatory and suggest to Senators that they observe the rule.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, let me see if I can settle the matter by asking unanimous consent for the publication in the RECORD of the memorial which I presented, which is brief in character, from lawyers of the city of San Francisco upon the subject of the proposed enlargement of the Supreme Court.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall make no objection, in view of the statement of the Senator from California.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. As I understand, in each instance the speech or the memorial is ordered published in the Appendix of the RECORD. The objection raised heretofore was to the printing in the body of the RECORD of other than memorials from legislatures.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I made the first objection. I stated at that time that I did not care where these matters were embodied in the RECORD. The RECORD records the entire proceedings of the Senate and the House of Representatives, whether in the body of the RECORD or in the Appendix, of many matters which should merely be referred to committees.

I stand here to prevent discrimination as between Senators, though I know no one desires to have that practiced or countenanced. I object to the publishing in the RECORD of the document offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN], inasmuch as objection has been made to the memorial offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] being printed. I think the same effect will be accomplished if they are referred to the Judiciary Committee as if they are published in the RECORD.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield?

Mr. McNARY. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I assumed there would be no objection to publishing in the Appendix of the RECORD any outstanding address dealing with a legislative matter—or, in fact, whether it deals with a legislative matter or not. If the Senator from Oregon objects to publishing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD or the Appendix of the RECORD addresses delivered on the particular question relating to reform of the judiciary, I shall abide by his will in the matter; but the practice has been followed, I think, almost every day since I have been a Member of the Senate. If the Senator now desires to object, of course, I can do nothing but accept and withhold the address which I presented a moment ago.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator is not quite conversant with the rule. If I should object, he could read the article himself, and thus it would appear in the RECORD.

Mr. LOGAN. O Mr. President, I would not think of doing a thing like that over the protest of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. I am not seeking at this time to assert any new rule. I seek only to prevent inequalities in practice and observance of the rules among Senators.

I go further. A very unusual situation has taken hold of the country. A grave subject confronts us. We will have thousands of memorials and thousands of petitions, many of which are not worth reading, but they will be printed in the RECORD and will be of no assistance whatsoever to the few of the public who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and to the fewer Senators who may read it. Therefore, I should like to see all documents relating to this important subject merely referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

I am not writing a new rule. I thought that was more or less the understanding I had with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] a few days ago.

I conclude by saying that if the document offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] is to be published in the RECORD, then I insist that the document submitted by the Senator from California likewise be published.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the rule to which the Senator from Oregon refers relates to petitions and memorials. Under the rule memorials by legislative bodies are required to be printed in the RECORD. Petitions from other sources may be merely referred to some committee.

The practice has grown up of printing in the RECORD, by unanimous consent, addresses delivered from time to time not only by Senators themselves but by others. The rule does not govern that matter. Any Senator may object when a request is made for the printing of an address in the RECORD. Objections have been made rarely heretofore insofar as my memory goes.

A question of policy is involved. Manifestly, if the request of one Senator for publication of an address in the RECORD be objected to, that objection ought to extend to other similar requests; but we ought not to adopt a practice of printing in the RECORD all the petitions and memorials which come from private sources; otherwise the RECORD would become too voluminous.

There is a distinction, I am informed, between the request of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] and the request of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. The document submitted by the Senator from California is in the nature of a petition or memorial. The request of the Senator from Kentucky involves the publication of a speech or an address. Manifestly we cannot print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD all the speeches that are being made on the subject of the Federal judiciary. There ought to be some limitation. The only limitation that exists now under the rule is the right of any Senator to object when such a request is submitted.

The suggestion was made to the Senator from California that his petition or memorial, not being an address or a speech strictly speaking, should be noted in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Any Senator has the power and the right to object to a request for the reading of any document, the rule merely requiring that legislative resolutions shall be printed in the RECORD; and I think that rule should be conformed to.

I think we ought to take advice and counsel together as to whether we wish to adopt a rule or a practice of objecting to the publication in the RECORD of public speeches delivered outside of the Senate. It is rather a far-reaching proposal. It is not on all fours with the proposal of the Senator from California. If we let the floodgates down and have printed in the RECORD everything that is said on this subject, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will become more and more unreadable because of the volume of which it will consist. I should like to see a practice pursued that is nondiscriminatory. If we object to the printing of speeches in general, shall we also object to the printing of speeches made by Senators over the radio? We have had more than a dozen of them printed in the past 10 days. We are also having printed in the RECORD editorials that are published from time to time. That is a custom which has prevailed in the Senate since the beginning of my service here, if not prior thereto.

I do not know that the Senate is prepared to adopt a hard and fast rule excluding from the RECORD all matter that is not delivered in the Senate. It might be a very good rule; but I think the Rules Committee ought to consider it before we adopt it, because I think it will not be 5 days until it will be disregarded. A request will be made for the publication of a speech, and no objection will be made to it, and the speech will be published.

If we are going to adopt a rule of that sort, I think we ought to know exactly what we are doing when we do it. If we are going to undertake to have printed in the RECORD all petitions and memorials that come from private sources, we ought to understand that that is the course upon which we are embarking. I think the best thing we can do is to go forward as we have been doing; to have printed in the RECORD, as the rule requires, memorials from State legislatures or other legislative bodies, and have noted in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committee petitions and memorials, and then exercise our right to object when a request is made for the printing of a speech in the RECORD.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have never made any suggestion that speeches delivered by Senators or Members of the House of Representatives should not be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. We probably could reach an adjustment of this matter by reference to the Rules Committee. In order to solve the present situation, I am going to ask unanimous consent that the memorial or petition presented by the Senator from California be printed in the RECORD, along with the speech presented by the Senator from Kentucky, leaving the matter to be adjusted in the future by the Senate or the Rules Committee upon proper reference by this body.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I have in my office several petitions on the same subject; and if we are to have some petitions placed in the RECORD, it is my belief that we should have others placed in the RECORD. I shall therefore feel impelled to ask that these petitions also be printed in the RECORD. I do not think it is proper to have some petitions printed without having them all printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understood the Senator from Kentucky, he is perfectly willing to have his speech referred to the committee, together with the memorial of the Senator from California. If that is the position of the Senator from Kentucky, it will solve the question at once.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I do not wish to disagree at all with the ingenious, courteous, and distinguished Senator from Oregon, the Republican floor leader; and because of the attitude which he takes, and which he has a right to take, I of course shall be perfectly willing to have the speech referred to the Judiciary Committee, together with the other matter. I shall only say that a few days ago I presented and had published in the RECORD a very strong attack by a leading Kentucky lawyer on the proposal of the President. The speech I have here today is a very strong presentation of the President's case by another outstanding attorney, and I thought I ought to treat them both alike; but it is perfectly all right with me for these matters to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the speech referred to by the Senator from Kentucky and the memorial presented by the Senator from California will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any particular objection to the action proposed in this case; but if it is going to result in excluding from the RECORD speeches made upon this subject outside of the Senate, I think we should hesitate a long time before we do anything of that kind.

The matter which is the subject of these speeches and memorials is one of extraordinary importance, from whatever viewpoint we may consider it. For myself, I should want to see these speeches placed where we can all use them if we desire to do so. Petitions and memorials are easily disposed of under the rule. We can send them to the committee; but addresses by able men or women pro and con upon this subject ought to be available to the Senate, and they ought to be available to the country. They are in the nature of petitions upon one of the most vital questions that can possibly arise in this body. I do not desire to see adopted a rule which would exclude such speeches from the RECORD. This is a subject upon which the people are entitled to be heard, if there is any subject left upon which the people are permitted to be heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, what is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair took it upon himself to put the question whether there was objection to referring the speech presented by the Senator from Kentucky and the memorial presented by the Senator from California to the Judiciary Committee, both of those Senators having expressed a willingness to have the matters go there. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, I should like to ask a parliamentary question. I understand that, under the rule, resolutions from State legislatures are printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, they are printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GERRY. Are they printed in the body of the RECORD?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They are.

Mr. GERRY. That is what I desired to know.

REORGANIZATION OF FEDERAL JUDICIARY—EDITORIAL FROM MONTGOMERY (ALA.) JOURNAL AND TIMES

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, a very timely editorial entitled "A Dangerous Precedent" was published on Saturday, March 13, 1937, in the Montgomery (Ala.) Journal and Times. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD, if that does not violate the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I present, for appropriate disposition, a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island relating to lynching.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and, under the rule, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island recommending to the Congress of the United States the passage of legislation now pending in said Congress to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws by discouraging, preventing, and punishing the crime of lynching

Whereas there are now pending in the Congress of the United States certain bills providing assurance to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, by discouraging, preventing, and punishing the crime of lynching; and

Whereas the passage of such legislation would be of the greatest benefit in maintaining a standard of equal justice for all, no matter the nature of the crime: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island respectfully requests the Senators and Representatives from Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States to give their earnest support to said bills and to use their efforts to secure the early passage of this legislation, or legislation of similar purport, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the secretary of state to the Senators and Representatives of Rhode Island in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. NYE presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the United States and Canada negotiated a treaty in the year 1932 providing for the joint construction of the St. Lawrence Seaway, which treaty has been ever since, and is now, awaiting ratification by the United States Senate; and

Whereas the early completion of this great international waterway project is necessary, not only to establish equality in transportation costs between seaboard States and Midwestern and Northwestern States but also to restore prosperity to the entire Northwest, including North Dakota; and

Whereas the President of the United States has repeatedly approved the St. Lawrence seaway project and has recommended the ratification of said treaty at a previous session of Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the President of the United States is hereby memorialized to resubmit said treaty to the United States Senate for ratification at the present session of Congress, and that the Senate of the United States is hereby urged to ratify said treaty at the earliest possible time, to the end that the necessary enabling legislation for the completion of the waterway project may be adopted by this Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, and to each Member of Congress and the Senators from North Dakota.

Mr. NYE also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the Congress of the United States to provide for the care of needy aged and blind ward Indians and the dependent children of ward Indian families

Whereas there are several hundred ward Indians eligible to receive old-age and blind assistance, and several hundred ward Indian children eligible to receive aid to dependent children in the State of North Dakota; and

Whereas, because of their status as residents of Indian reservations, they and their property are not subject to taxation by the State or county in which they reside; and

Whereas, because of the heavy burden placed upon these counties in making payments of old-age and blind assistance and dependent-children aid to qualified taxpaying residents, the counties are under excessive financial strain; and

Whereas it is an undue hardship upon the said State and counties to provide care for these ward Indians because of the facts above stated: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Twenty-fifth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, respectfully memorialize Congress to provide Federal funds for the care and relief of these above referred to needy aged and blind ward Indians and the dependent children of ward Indian families; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the United States Senate and the United States House of Representatives and to each of the Senators and Representatives of the State of North Dakota in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. NYE also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals:

Whereas, due to the wise forethought of President Theodore Roosevelt, the United States Government constructed the Panama Canal at a cost of approximately $385,000,000, primarily for the purpose of permitting the speedy transfer of naval vessels from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, and vice versa, in case of hostilities; and

Whereas, due to the low toll charges, commercial vessels of all nations are using the facilities of the Canal at less than cost, with the result that there is an annual deficit in the Canal's operations of approximately $30,000,000; and

Whereas the consumer is still paying for commodities so transported the same prices charged as when the transportation was by rail: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we urge the Congress of the United States to pass all necessary legislation and the President of the United States to carry out the provisions thereof, providing for sufficient toll charges for the use of the Panama Canal facilities so that there will be no deficit; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and the Senators and Congressmen from North Dakota.

Mr. McADOO presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, favoring the enactment of legislation to provide annuities for widows of retired Federal civil-service employees at the rate of $50 per month, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

(See joint resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 11th inst., p. 2100, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Roslindale, Mass., praying for the enactment of the so-called Townsend old-age pension law, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GIBSON presented memorials of sundry citizens of Brattleboro, Vt., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or any other legislation of a similar character, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a resolution adopted by the convention of the Associated General Contractors of America, at San Antonio, Tex., favoring the enactment of legislation to provide insurance of loans for the construction of commercial and industrial structures where economically advisable, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the convention of Associated General Contractors of America, at San Antonio, Tex., commending the P. W. A. and favoring the adoption of policies similar to the P. W. A. policies by the W. P. A. and other governmental agencies, so as to alleviate unemployment and assist in recovery, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the convention of Associated General Contractors of America, at San Antonio, Tex., favoring amendment of the Revenue Act of 1936, so as to permit the deduction of amounts equal to the sum of the amounts paid out during the taxable year for construction on or improvement of real property, for the purchase and installation of equipment and machinery, and for the expansion or replacement of plants, and so forth, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the convention of Associated General Contractors of America, at San Antonio, Tex., opposing the diversion of motor-vehicle and gasoline taxes for any purpose other than providing highway facilities, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

PROPOSED BUCHANAN LOST PINE PROJECT, TEXAS

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution in the nature of a memorial adopted by the House of Representatives of the Texas Legislature requesting establishment of a Resettlement project in Lost Pine area, Bastrop County, Tex., to be known as Buchanan Lost Pine project, in honor of the late and beloved Representative James P. Buchanan, and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Land Utilization Division of the Resettlement Administration has some 98 land-use projects throughout the United States and the State of Texas has been granted only one such project; and

Whereas there is a large body of eroded and devastated land in Bastrop County known as the Lost Pine area that should be developed by reforestration and also as a recreation area and wildlife sanctuary; and

Whereas our late beloved Congressman, James P. Buchanan, asked the Resettlement Administration for funds to purchase and develop this area: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we ask the Resettlement Administration to allocate such amount necessary to purchase and develop the Lost Pine area, and such Government-owned and developed area to be known as the Buchanan Lost Pine project in honor of the late Congressman Buchanan; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States and a copy to each Texas Senator and to each Texas Congressman.

REFINANCING OF OBLIGATIONS OF POLITICAL SUBDIVISIONS

Mr. SHEPPARD. I also present for appropriate reference a concurrent resolution in the nature of a memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Texas in behalf of Federal legislation aiding political subdivisions of States to refinance obligations based on tax resources diminished by Federal land purchases.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Forty-third Legislature of the State of Texas in regular session adopted Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 73, giving the consent of the State that the Federal Government purchase lands in Texas for reforestation and other purposes; and

Whereas pursuant to such consent on the part of the State the United States has purchased and is purchasing large tracts of land, particularly for watershed protection and forest preservation purposes; and

Whereas in the eastern part of the State the tracts have been purchased in such large contiguous areas that in several counties more than 50 percent of the area of said counties is being purchased, thus removing said lands from taxation for State, county, district, and municipal purposes; and

Whereas in some of said counties more than 25 percent of the assessed valuation of property is being thus removed from the tax rolls; and

Whereas in many instances the entire area of school districts and the entire area of road districts is being removed from taxation; and

Whereas the State of Texas has already granted its consent to such program because of the beneficial results which will accrue to the section of the State involved, and which will accrue to the State generally; and

Whereas the State likewise is affected by the removal of such large areas from taxation in the following particulars:

(a) In the future the State will not receive from said lands the taxes it has been receiving in the past for State ad valorem, State pension, and State available school purposes;

(b) The State owns in its permanent school fund and in other funds bonds of counties, cities, road districts, and school districts situated within the affected area, which cannot be paid according to their tenor and effect because of the removal from taxation of a substantial part of the property originally securing said indebtedness;

(c) The State is interested in the condition of the citizens of said communities, upon whom the burden of paying taxes will rest after said lands have been released from taxation, which burdens, in the instance of bonds, which are supported by unlimited taxing power, must be materially increased; and in instances wherein said bonds are supported by limited taxing power must be increased to the maximum; and

Whereas at the time of the purchase by the United States Government a great amount of this land was delinquent for ad-valorem taxes, both to the State, counties, and districts affected; and

Whereas by reason of such purchase by the United States Government said land is exempted from taxation and will result in the financial insolvency of said counties and districts affected in a great many instances; and

Whereas it is the belief of this legislature that the United States Government, by reason of said purchase of land in such large amount in these areas, has more or less obligated itself to see that the least amount of injury is occasioned to its citizens thereby affected; and

Whereas the State of Texas appreciates the cooperation of the United States Government and the benefits which will accrue from the reforestation program, but desires the further cooperation of the Government in relieving the attendant hardships insofar as consistent and practical; and

Whereas this legislature is hopeful that after a reconsideration of this condition by the Congress of the United States and the executive department thereof that some legislation will be passed and approved which will accomplish the purpose of relieving these conditions: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and the same is hereby, requested to pass legislation in some form entitling the State of Texas and its political subdivisions to be reimbursed for the loss in taxes which resulted from the purchase of said land by the Federal Government until the taxable values of such political subdivisions have increased to the extent occasioned by such purchase upon the part of the Federal Government; and that the President of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to give careful consideration of these problems to the end that if he can consistently do so he may cooperate and approve such legislation; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the United States, to each United States Senator, and to each Congressman of the State of Texas.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR (for Mr. GLASS), from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 175) thereon.

Mr. McKELLAR also from the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 131) for the payment of certain employees of the United States Government in the District of Columbia and employees of the District of Columbia for January 20, 1937, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 174) thereon.

Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 1470) authorizing and empowering the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the old post-office building at Oakland, Calif., and to convey to the city of Oakland portions of the site for street-widening purposes in accordance with the provisions of public act approved August 26, 1935 (49 Stat. 800), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 176) thereof.

He also, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 221) to permit articles imported from foreign countries for the purpose of exhibition at the Greater Texas and Pan-American Exposition, Dallas, Tex., to be admitted without payment of tariff, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 177) thereon.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan, from the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 272) to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to accept title for the United States to certain real property to be donated by Mr. Henry Ford and wife for Veterans' Administration facility purposes reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 179) thereon.

Mr. VAN NUYS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred the following joint resolutions, reported adversely thereon:

S. J. Res. 23. Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to proclaim October 11 of each year General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski;

S. J. Res. 24. Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11 of each year General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski;

GENERAL PULASKI'S MEMORIAL DAY—REPORT OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE

Mr. VAN NUYS (for himself, Mr. MINTON, and Mr. LONERGAN), from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which were referred Senate Joint Resolutions 37, 42, and 48 (with identical titles), authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11, 1937, General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, reported in lieu thereof a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 102) authorizing the President of the United States of America to proclaim October 11, 1937, General Pulaski's Memorial Day for the observance and commemoration of the death of Brig. Gen. Casimir Pulaski, which was read twice by its title; and Mr. VAN NUYS submitted a report (No. 178) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The original joint resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary will be placed on the calendar.

INVESTIGATION OF RAILROAD HOLDING AND AFFILIATED COMPANIES (S. REPT. 180)

BROADCASTING PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate I desire to explain a resolution I am about to submit so that it will not be misunderstood.

It is a Senate resolution authorizing and directing the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, to make a full and complete investigation of the advisability of broadcasting by radio the proceedings of the Congress upon matters of public importance and of having assigned to the various classes of radio stations for that purpose bands of frequencies or wave lengths. The committee is directed to report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

I wish to call attention to the fact that the resolution does not recommend that action be taken by Congress, but it does require an investigation and report by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, which for many years has had jurisdiction over matters relating to radio.

I have always opposed such action by Congress. It has been informally considered among Senators for quite a while, but it appears that when such important matters are before Congress as are now before it, it is advisable to have the facts relating to such subjects accurately reported to the country, which is not true in many cases. It is also essential for our editorial writers to have the facts. As a general thing, of course, facts are not essential to editorial writers, but occasionally they assume to quote what they term facts as the basis of very erudite discussions.

For instance, referring particularly to neutrality legislation, there has been published in the press, from the very beginning of the proposed legislation, the bill as introduced, and finally the bill as reported; and yet there has been made, time and time again, the statement that the proposed legislation grants to the President of the United States the right to declare an embargo on everything. Of course that is not true; but that statement having been made time and time again, editorial articles are based upon the statement. Of course it has no effect on the Senate—at least it has not had so far—but it causes voluminous petitions to be crowded on our committees here, based on an erroneous statement of facts by persons who are supposed to have sufficient intelligence to know the facts.

It seems to me that the question is worthy of consideration by the Interstate Commerce Committee, whether or not, in view of the important matters which are before the Congress of the United States, the people of the country are entitled to the facts; and I therefore submit the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 93) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the advisability of broadcasting by radio the proceedings of the Congress upon matters of public importance and of having assigned to the various classes of radio stations for that purpose bands of frequencies of wave lengths. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fifth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $———, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was wondering whether the resolution should not be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. PITTMAN. I have made that request, and I may say to the Senator from Utah that my reason for the request is that since we have been considering legislation with regard to the science of radio, matters involving radio have always been considered by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. The resolution now under discussion, however, has relation to the rules and procedure of the Senate primarily. I suggest that the proper jurisdiction lies in the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KING. I also entertain that opinion.

Mr. PITTMAN. The resolution might be referred to the Committee on Rules after being reported by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to determine whether the Committee on Rules desired to adopt the report of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The resolution, of course, deals with bands and wave lengths, which I assume would have to be taken from some other user. It deals with the expense incident to the inauguration of a broadcasting system such as the resolution contemplates, and I merely ask in the resolution for a report of the Committee on Interstate Commerce as to the advisability of such installation, and the facts surrounding it, the report to be made to the Senate. I agree with Senators entirely that whether or not the Senate should undertake such installation after the report had been submitted would be a proper matter for the Committee on Rules to decide.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the Senator is not asking that the Committee on Interstate Commerce determine the advisability of installing the necessary machinery and mechanism in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of broadcasting to the country the proceedings of the Senate, but merely the cost of installing such an instrumentality, and also as to whether there would be any interference with wave lengths which have been granted to other users.

Mr. PITTMAN. The committee undoubtedly would find the facts as to the situation, and submit their report to the Senate. I have no doubt that after the report had been submitted some Senator would move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules, which would ultimately have the jurisdiction of reporting on the adoption of such a system.

Mr. KING. I object to having this matter determined by one committee, to wit, the Committee on Interstate Commerce. The Committee on the Judiciary, the Committee on Finance, the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, and the Committee on Foreign Relations perhaps are more interested in this matter than is the Committee on Interstate Commerce. It seems to me that if the resolution is to be referred, in order to obtain the views of the committees as to the feasibility of such a plan, the resolution would have to go to all of the committees of the Senate, particularly the important ones.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no objection to the resolution's going to all the committees, except that I find some difficulty in the procedure.

I ask that the resolution be referred first to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and if it ever comes back from that committee it can go to the Committee on Rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

NUMBER AND APPORTIONMENT OF CIVIL-SERVICE EMPLOYEES

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 92, relating to the number and apportionment of civil-service employees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 92) submitted by Mr. HAYDEN on the 12th instant, as follows:

Whereas the rule of apportionment under the Civil Service Act provides that appointments to the public service in the executive departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census; and

Whereas the report of the Civil Service Commission as of February 15, 1937, contains a record of only 39,744 civil-service apportioned appointments in Washington; and

Whereas that number represents less than 10 percent of the total number of Federal employees with civil-service status; and

Whereas of the said 39,744 appointees, 8,989, or 22.6 percent, are residents of the District of Columbia; and

Whereas the reform of the civil-service system and its extension to emergency agencies is under consideration by the Congress: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Civil Service Commission is hereby requested to furnish the Senate the following information:

(1) The total number of employees with civil-service status in Washington, D. C.

(2) The total number of employees with civil-service status engaged in field service outside of Washington.

(3) A statement showing the apportionment by States of all civil-service employees in Washington, including those who have been blanketed into the civil service or secured a status through noncompetitive examination, or in any other manner, according to the legal residence of such employees at the time they were appointed.

(4) A similar statement showing the apportionment by States of all civil-service employees engaged in field service outside of Washington according to the legal residence of such employees at the time they were appointed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to know what the resolution calls for?

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the resolution calls for information from the Civil Service Commission, first, as to the total number of employees with civil-service status in the District of Columbia; the total number of employees with civil-service status in the field service outside the city of Washington; a statement showing the apportionment, by States, of all civil-service employees in the District of Columbia; and like information with respect to civil-service employees outside of the District.

I have conferred with the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, and he states there is no difficulty at all in providing the Senate with the information called for in the first three interrogatories. To obtain the field information may take some time, as the Commission will have to obtain it from the 13 civil-service districts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

SENATOR ASHURST—ARTICLES FROM BUFFALO EVENING NEWS AND WASHINGTON HERALD

[Mr. VAN NUYS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD articles from the Buffalo Evening News of Mar. 9, 1937, and the Washington Herald of Mar. 13, 1937, relative to Senator ASHURST, which appear in the Appendix.]

CONSIDERATION OF UNOBJECTED BILLS ON CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under rule VIII is now in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] gave notice a day or two ago that this morning he would move the consideration of the joint resolution relating to a national gallery of art. I ask him at this time whether it would suit his convenience to have the Senate proceed first with the call of the calendar for the consideration of unobjected bills, and that the Senator make his motion at the conclusion of that order. There are only a few bills on the calendar.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if that is the desire of the Senator from Arkansas, it is perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, with the understanding that following that order, if the request shall be agreed to, the Senator from Texas may make his motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will call the first order of business on the calendar.

RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The resolution (S. Res. 8) limiting debate on general appropriation bills was announced as first in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let that go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this is the joint resolution of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], to which I have just referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be passed over.

REIMBURSEMENT OF STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS

The bill (S. 761) for the relief of the State of Massachusetts was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Governor of the State of Massachusetts or his duly authorized agents the sum of $233,885.82, being the costs, charges, and expenses properly incurred by such State for interest and premium paid for coin in payment of such interest on bonds issued for money borrowed and expended at the request of the President of the United States during the Civil War in protecting the harbors and fortifying the coast. The accounting officers of the Treasury have found that said expenditures were so incurred and paid by the Senate; and the Court of Claims in its report to Congress under the act approved July 16, 1916, as set forth in House Document No. 369, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, also found they had been so incurred and paid.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 548) for the relief of Dorothy White, Mrs. Carol M. White, and Charles A. White was announced as next in order.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, at the request of the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] I ask that this bill go over. The junior Senator from Arizona has just been called from the Chamber to a meeting of the Committee on Appropriations and desires to obtain more data with reference to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1095) to provide a government for American Samoa was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, at the request of the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is necessarily absent, I ask that this bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1435) to create a board of shorthand reporting, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1436) providing for the employment of skilled shorthand reporting in the executive branch of the Government, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. I make the same request with reference to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MICHAEL E. SULLIVAN

The bill (H. R. 1096) for the relief of Michael E. Sullivan was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1170) for the extension and completion of the United States Capitol was announced as next in order.

Mr. GILLETTE. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 792) for the relief of Sam Larson, guardian of Margaret Larson, a minor, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] desired that this bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EXCHANGE OF LAND WITH UTAH

The bill (S. 1129) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to accept from the State of Utah title to a certain State-owned section of land and to patent other land to the State in lieu thereof, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to accept on behalf of the United States a deed of reconveyance from the State of Utah of all of section 2, township 12 south, range 19 east, Salt Lake meridian, Utah, when accompanied by evidence showing unencumbered title in said State, and in exchange therefor the Secretary of the Interior is hereby further authorized to patent to the State of Utah other vacant, unappropriated, and unreserved public land, whether mineral or nonmineral in character, of approximately equal area and value, to be used for the same purpose for which the lands so reconveyed were granted, and to be subject to the same conditions and limitations which applied to said reconveyed lands.

SEC. 2. That upon issuance of patent to the State for the land selected in exchange, the land reconveyed shall become a part of Naval Oil Shale Reserve No. 2, Utah No. 1, for the exclusive use or benefit of the United States Navy.

BUREAU OF MINES EXPERIMENT STATION, UTAH

The bill (S. 628) to provide for the construction and equipment of a building for the experiment station of the Bureau of Mines at Salt Lake City, Utah, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to enter into a contract or contracts for the erection and equipment of a building or buildings on a site adjacent to the campus of the University of Utah at Salt Lake City, Utah, suitable for use by the Bureau of Mines for the mining experiment station at Salt Lake City, at a cost not to exceed $300,000, including plumbing, lighting, heating, and other general-service equipment and necessary roads, walks, and ground improvement: Provided, That a site adjacent to said campus, acceptable to the Secretary of the Interior, is donated and conveyed by deed giving absolute title to the United States Government.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300,000 for carrying out the purposes of this act.

INVESTIGATION OF INTERSTATE RAILROADS AND AFFILIATES

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 86) authorizing an additional amount for expenditure in an investigation of interstate railroads and affiliates, which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Committee on Interstate Commerce, authorized by Resolutions Nos. 71 and 227, Seventy-fourth Congress, to investigate all phases of railroad financing, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate, in furtherance of the purposes of the above-mentioned resolutions, the railroads to be selected for investigation to be selected by the committee, $150,000 in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized for said purposes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, was this resolution referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was referred to that committee.

Mr. McNARY. And the Committee on Interstate Commerce has likewise considered it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and is now on the calendar under a report of the latter committee.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 976) relating to labor preferences in connection with certain public-works projects was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who introduced this bill, should explain it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. PITTMAN). The Senator from Nevada asks that under the circumstances the bill go over for the present.

FINAL PROOF BY HOMESTEAD AND DESERT-LAND ENTRYMEN

The bill (S. 329) to further extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead and desert-land entrymen was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act entitled "An act to extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead entrymen", approved May 13, 1932, as amended, is amended by striking out "December 31, 1935" and inserting in lieu thereof "December 31, 1936."

INVESTIGATION OF RECLAMATION PROJECTS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 413) to extend the time for the completion of the investigation of reclamation projects authorized by the act of April 14, 1936, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That there is hereby created a commission to be composed of three members, all of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, one of whom shall be a landowner and water user under a United States reclamation project. The commission is authorized and directed to investigate the financial and economic condition of the various United States reclamation projects, with particular reference to the ability of each such project to make payments of water-right charges without undue burden on the water users, district, association, or other reclamation organization liable for such charges. Such investigation shall include an examination and consideration of any statement filed with the commission, or the Department of the Interior, by any such district, association, or other reclamation organization, or the water users thereof, and, where requested by any such district, association, or other reclamation organization, said commission shall proceed to such project and hold hearings, the proceedings of which shall be reduced to writing and filed with its report. Said commission, after having made careful investigation and study of the financial and economic condition of the various United States reclamation projects and their probable present and future ability to meet such water-right charges, shall report to the Congress, as soon as practicable, with its recommendations as to the best, most feasible, and practicable comprehensive permanent plan for such water-right payments, with due consideration for the development and carrying on of the reclamation program of the United States, and having particularly in mind the probable ability of such water users, districts, associations, or other reclamation organizations to meet such water-right charges regularly and faithfully from year to year, during periods of prosperity and good prices for agricultural products as well as during periods of decline in agricultural income and unsatisfactory conditions of agriculture.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, which shall be available for expenditure, as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, for expenses and all necessary disbursements, including salaries, in carrying out the provisions of this act. The commission is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such employees as may be necessary for carrying out its functions under this act without regard to civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 3. That all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to further extend relief to water users on the United States reclamation projects and on Indian irrigation projects", approved June 13, 1935, as amended and extended by the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to create a commission and to extend further relief to water users on United States reclamation projects and on Indian irrigation projects", approved April 14, 1936, are hereby further extended for the period of 1 year, so far as concerns 50 percent of the construction charges, for the calendar year 1937: Provided, however, That where the construction charge for the calendar year 1937 is payable in two installments the sum hereby extended shall be the amount due as the first of such installments. If payable in one installment the due date for the 50 percent to be paid shall not be changed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not objecting to the consideration of the bill, but I desire to direct attention to the fact that the next bill on the calendar, Senate bill 48, authorizes the expenditure of $600,000 for the purpose of investigating Federal reclamation projects. I was wondering whether that bill would not be a duplication of the bill now under consideration.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Utah, I may say that there will not be any duplication. As I understand, Senate bill 413 has to do with future reclamation work. That bill, introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], provides only for a continuation of what has been done for the past 5 years, and at the same time that an investigation shall be made as to the ability of the water users to meet the payments; the idea being that the committee which will be appointed may, after investigation, recommend that the pending contracts in reclamation projects be modified in some way.

Mr. KING. I direct the attention of the Senate to a provision in Senate bill 48, the next bill on the calendar, that the commission thereby created shall make—

Investigations of proposed Federal reclamation projects, surveys for the reconstruction and rehabilitation of existing projects—

And so forth. It seems to me that the study of the rehabilitation of existing projects would cover the purpose for which the first bill to which I directed attention was introduced.

Mr. CHAVEZ. I invite the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that at the last session the Congress passed a bill similar to the pending bill providing for an investigation, but for some reason or other nothing was done about the matter. Under the pending bill it is intended that such an investigation shall be made.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention simply to the fact that the Department of the Interior reported against the final bill on the Calendar, being Senate bill 48.

Mr. KING. Yes, Mr. President; I have just discovered that fact. However, we are now considering Calendar No. 175, Senate bill 413. When we come to consider Calendar No. 176, Senate bill 48, another question will be raised. I have no objection to the present consideration of Senate bill 413.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. REYNOLDS in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 413) to extend the time for the completion of the investigation of reclamation projects authorized by the act of April 14, 1936, which had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That there is hereby created a commission to be composed of three members, all of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior, one of whom shall be a landowner and water user under a United States reclamation project. The commission is authorized and directed to investigate the financial and economic condition of the various United States reclamation projects, with particular reference to the ability of each such project to make payments of water-right charges without undue burden on the water users, district, association, or other reclamation organization liable for such charges. Such investigation shall include an examination and consideration of any statement filed with the commission, or the Department of the Interior, by any such district, association, or other reclamation organization, or the water users thereof, and, where requested by any such district, association, or other reclamation organization, said commission shall proceed to such project and hold hearings, the proceedings of which shall be reduced to writing and filed with its report. Said commission, after having made careful investigation and study of the financial and economic condition of the various United States reclamation projects and their probable present and future ability to meet such water-right charges, shall report to the Congress, as soon as practicable, with its recommendations as to the best, most feasible, and practicable comprehensive permanent plan for such water-right payments, with due consideration for the development and carrying on of the reclamation program of the United States, and having particularly in mind the probable ability of such water users, districts, associations, or other reclamation organizations to meet such water-right charges regularly and faithfully from year to year, during periods of prosperity and good prices for agricultural products as well as during periods of decline in agricultural income and unsatisfactory conditions of agriculture.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, which shall be available for expenditure, as the Secretary of the Interior may direct, for expenses and all necessary disbursements, including salaries, in carrying out the provisions of this act. The commission is authorized to appoint and fix the compensation of such employees as may be necessary for carrying out its functions under this act without regard to civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

SEC. 3. That all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to further extend relief to water users on the United States reclamation projects and on Indian irrigation projects", approved June 13, 1935, as amended and extended by the provisions of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to create a commission and to extend further relief to water users on United States reclamation projects and on Indian irrigation projects", approved April 14, 1936, are hereby further extended for the period of 1 year, so far as concerns

50 percent of the construction charges, for the calendar year 1937: Provided, however, That where the construction charge for the calendar year 1937 is payable in two installments the sum hereby extended shall be the amount due as the first of such installments. If payable in one installment the due date for the 50 percent to be paid shall not be changed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to create a commission and to extend further relief to water users on United States reclamation projects and on Indian irrigation projects."

INVESTIGATION OF CONDITIONS UNDER FEDERAL RECLAMATION LAWS

The bill (S. 48) to authorize an appropriation for investigation under the Federal reclamation laws was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, this bill is quite an important one, and in all probability will require rather extended discussion. The Senator who introduced the bill and who also reported it is necessarily absent, so I suggest that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

That completes the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar in regular order.

LABOR PREFERENCES ON PUBLIC-WORKS PROJECTS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada was occupying the chair at the time Calendar No. 173, Senate bill 976, was reached. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] at that time asked for an explanation of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate recur to Senate bill 976.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 976) relating to labor preferences in connection with certain public-works projects, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the object of this bill is to amend section 206 of the National Industrial Recovery Act. That act, with regard to labor preferences, contains the following provision:

(4) That in the employment of labor in connection with any such project, preference shall be given, where they are qualified, to ex-service men with dependents, and then in the following order: (a) To citizens of the United States and aliens who have declared their intention of becoming citizens who are bona-fide residents of the political subdivision and/or county in which the work is to be performed, and (b) to citizens of the United States and aliens who have declared their intention of becoming citizens, who are bona-fide residents of the State, Territory, or district in which the work is to be performed.

A case has arisen before the Public Works Administrator the circumstances of which I will relate. Reclamation districts in the State of Nevada desiring to obtain more water for the purpose of meeting the necessity of irrigation have borrowed a million dollars from the Public Works Administration for the purpose of putting in a dam on a little river and impounding water. The dam is a few miles across the California line. It is in what is called Nevada County, Calif. The project is for the benefit of the adjoining counties in the State of Nevada. The money is all being contributed by two reclamation districts in the State of Nevada. Nothing is being contributed by California or by any citizens of California, but under the law preference must be given to the unemployed, first in the county, and second in the State where the project is located. The pending measure does not change the preference as to the county, but it provides that after the labor in the county is exhausted, instead of going over a mountain range and down into distant California, the Secretary of the Interior shall be allowed, if the contractors are willing, to utilize and employ labor in the adjoining counties in the adjoining State, the people of which are contributing toward the building of these works. That is the simple proposition.

I will say that already we have an agreement on the subject, but, of course, it is not sustained by law.

Here is a telegram on the subject which I have received from the commissioners of labor of the State of Nevada:

Have arranged with California Employment Service, Reno employment office, to furnish labor for Boca Dam.

That is the dam in question.

Nevada to furnish 75 percent, Nevada County, Calif., 25 percent. Arrangement satisfactory to Reno people and California Employment Service. Think these figures might be used in your bill if you deem it advisable.

The Secretary of the Interior now contends that he has no discretion; that when the labor available for this work in Nevada County, Calif., is exhausted, he is obliged to go across the Sierra Nevada Mountains, down to San Francisco or Los Angeles, for labor, while a few miles from there in Washoe County, Nev., there is a large amount of unemployment, and the people in Washoe and Churchill Counties, Nev., are contributing all the money for the project.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the bill apply exclusively to this one local situation?

Mr. PITTMAN. It does not apply exclusively by its terms, but I will say that it is the only project left. The funds in the appropriation are all allotted, and this is the only project in this situation. Therefore, in a sense, it is exclusive.

To make the matter ironclad, the amendment reads as follows:

That section 206 of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Where the work on any such project is to be performed in a political subdivision or county of any State which (1) is separated by mountain ranges or other natural barriers, or is otherwise remotely separated, from the centers of population in such State, (2) is not contributing to the financing of such project, (3) is adjacent or contiguous to counties in an adjaining State which are to receive the chief benefits of such project and which are contributing to the financing of such project, and (4) does not have a sufficient number of residents qualified to perform the work on such project who are entitled to a preference under clause (A) of the preceding paragraph of this section, the preference provisions of clause (B) of such paragraph shall not apply, but in lieu thereof preference shall be given to citizens of the United States and aliens who have declared their intention of becoming citizens, who are bona-fide residents of any of such counties of such adjoining State."

The foregoing amendments shall be included in every future contract with regard to such projects.

Such provisions shall not be in effect with regard to any such project where a contract or contracts have been entered into unless and until it has been mutually agreed between interested parties to such contract or contracts that the same shall be changed and modified so as to adopt and include in such contract or contracts the foregoing provisions. The Administrator shall attempt to reach such agreement as expeditiously as possible so that such change or modification may be made in such existing contracts.

I wish to read from the report what the Secretary of the Interior says about the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, unless the Senator desires to read the Secretary's report as necessary to the completion of his statement, I suggest that he not do so, because I am satisfied that the bill is wholesome and can work no harm whatever.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall not read it; but I will state that the report on the bill, which is on Senators' desks, contains a favorable report by the Secretary of the Interior asking for the enactment of the proposed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys was, on page 2, line 11, to strike out "The Administrator shall make such changes in the contracts relating to such projects as may be necessary in order to include therein the foregoing provisions of this paragraph", and to insert the following:

The foregoing amendments shall be included in every future contract with regard to such projects.

Such provisions shall not be in effect with regard to any such project where a contract or contracts have been entered into unless and until it has been mutually agreed between interested parties to such contract or contracts that the same shall be changed and modified so as to adopt and include in such contract or contracts the foregoing provisions. The Administrator shall attempt to reach such agreement as expeditiously as possible, so that such change or modification may be made in such existing contracts.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 206 of the National Industrial Recovery Act, approved June 16, 1933, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Where the work on any such project is to be performed in a political subdivision or county of any State which (1) is separated by mountain ranges or other natural barriers, or is otherwise remotely separated, from the centers of population in such State, (2) is not contributing to the financing of such project, (3) is adjacent or contiguous to counties in an adjoining State which are to receive the chief benefits of such project and which are contributing to the financing of such project, and (4) does not have a sufficient number of residents qualified to perform the work on such project who are entitled to a preference under clause (A) of the preceding paragraph of this section, the preference provisions of clause (B) of such paragraph shall not apply, but in lieu thereof preference shall be given to citizens of the United States and aliens who have declared their intention of becoming citizens, who are bona-fide residents of any of such counties of such adjoining State.

"The foregoing amendments shall be included in every future contract with regard to such projects.

"Such provisions shall not be in effect with regard to any such project where a contract or contracts have been entered into unless and until it has been mutually agreed between interested parties to such contract or contracts that the same shall be changed and modified so as to adopt and include in such contract or contracts the foregoing provisions. The Administrator shall attempt to reach such agreement as expeditiously as possible so that such change or modification may be made in such existing contracts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, pursuant to the notice given by me in the Chamber last week, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 73, providing for a national gallery of art.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) providing for the construction and maintenance of a national gallery of art, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, in section 5, paragraph (b), on page 5, line 21, to strike out "exhibited in" and insert "included in the permanent collection of", so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the area bounded by Seventh Street, Constitution Avenue, Fourth Street, and North Mall Drive NW., in the District of Columbia, is hereby appropriated to the Smithsonian Institution as a site for a National Gallery of Art. The Smithsonian Institution is authorized to permit the A. W. Mellon Educational and Charitable Trust (hereinafter referred to as the donor) to construct on said site for the Smithsonian Institute a building to be designated the National Gallery of Art, and to remove any existing structure and landscape the grounds within said area. The adjoining area bounded by Fourth Street, Pennsylvania Avenue, Third Street, and North Mall Drive NW., in the District of Columbia, is hereby reserved as a site for future additions to the National Gallery of Art. The project shall be in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Commission of Fine Arts.

SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established in the Smithsonian Institution a bureau, which shall be directed by a board to be known as the Trustees of the National Gallery of Art, whose duty it shall be to maintain and administer the National Gallery of Art and site thereof and to execute such other functions as are vested in the board by this act. The board shall be composed as follows: The Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, ex officio; and five general trustees who shall be citizens of the United States, to be chosen as hereinafter provided. No officer or employee of the Federal Government shall be eligible to be chosen as a general trustee.

(b) The general trustees first taking office shall be chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, subject to the approval of the donor, and shall have terms expiring one each on July 1 of 1939, 1941, 1943, 1945, and 1947, as designated by the Board of Regents. A successor shall be chosen by a majority vote of the general trustees and shall have a term expiring 10 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was chosen, except that a successor chosen to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of such term shall be chosen only for the remainder of such term.

SEC. 3. Upon completion of the National Gallery of Art, the board shall accept for the Smithsonian Institution as a gift from the donor a collection of works of art, which shall be housed and exhibited in the National Gallery of Art.

SEC. 4. (a) The faith of the United States is pledged that, on completion of the National Gallery of Art by the donor in accordance with the terms of this act and the acquisition from the donor of the collection of works of art, the United States will provide such funds as may be necessary for the upkeep of the National Gallery of Art and the administrative expenses and costs of operation thereof, including the protection and care of works of art acquired by the board, so that the National Gallery of Art shall be at all times properly maintained and the works of art contained therein shall be exhibited regularly to the general public. For these purposes there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary.

(b) The board is authorized to accept for the Smithsonian Institution and to hold and administer gifts, bequests, or devises of money, securities, or other property of whatsoever character for the benefit of the National Gallery of Art. Unless otherwise restricted by the terms of the gift, bequest, or devise, the board is authorized to sell or exchange and to invest or reinvest in such investments as it may determine from time to time, the moneys, securities, or other property composing trust funds given, bequeathed, or devised to or for the benefit of the National Gallery of Art. The income as and when collected shall be placed in such depositaries as the board shall determine and shall be subject to expenditure by the board.

(c) The board shall appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a director, an assistant director, a secretary, and a chief curator of the National Gallery of Art, and of such other officers and employees of the National Gallery of Art as may be necessary for the efficient administration of the functions of the board. Such director, assistant director, secretary, and chief curator shall be compensated from trust funds available to the board for the purpose, and their appointment and salaries shall not be subject to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The director, assistant director, secretary, and chief curator shall be well qualified by experience and training to perform the duties of their office and the original appointment to each such office shall be subject to the approval of the donor.

(d) The actions of the board, including any payment made or directed to be made by it from any trust funds, shall not be subject to review by any officer or agency other than a court of law.

SEC. 5. (a) The board is authorized to adopt an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed, and to make such bylaws, rules, and regulations as it deems necessary for the administration of its functions under this act, including among other matters bylaws, rules, and regulations relating to the acquisition, exhibition, and loan of works of art, the administration of its trust funds, and the organization and procedure of the board. The board may function notwithstanding vacancies, and three members of the board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

(b) In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no work of art shall be included in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Art unless they are of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

(c) The board shall have all the usual powers and obligations of a trustee in respect of all trust funds administered by it and all works of art acquired by it.

(d) The board shall submit to the Smithsonian Institution an annual report of its operations under this act, including a detailed statement of all acquisitions and loans of works of art and of all public and private moneys received and disbursed.

SEC. 6. (a) The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to close Sixth Street Northwest within the boundaries of the site for the National Gallery of Art. The National Capital Park and Planning Commission shall determine the building lines and approve the plan of approaches for said gallery, and shall also make recommendations for the widening and adjustment of Third, Seventh, Ninth, and such other streets in the vicinity as may be necessary and desirable to provide for the traffic which would otherwise use Sixth Street.

(b) Section 10 of the Public Building Act, approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L. 881), relating to the George Washington Memorial Building, and all provisions of law amendatory thereof, are hereby repealed.

(c) The existing bureau of the Smithsonian Institution now designated as a National Gallery of Art shall hereafter be known as the National Collection of Fine Arts.

(d) The fifth paragraph under the heading "Smithsonian Institution" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1924, approved February 13, 1923 (42 Stat. L. 1235), relating to the erection of a national gallery of art, is hereby repealed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] is going to make any statement in regard to the joint resolution?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not care to make a statement, unless there is some inquiry concerning it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment, as I must shortly leave the Chamber?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I read the RECORD of Friday and observed the courteous statement of the Senator from Texas that because of the objection I had made to the joint resolution he would let it go over. I may say, as I said on a previous occasion, that I made the objection because some architects of my city had complained about the form of the proposed national gallery. I have had no objection and have none now. So I thank the Senator for what he did, and I merely wish to state that my objection is purely formal.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it intended that the collection of artistic works comprehended by the gift shall be open to the public?

Mr. CONNALLY. It is.

Mr. BORAH. Free of charge?

Mr. CONNALLY. My understanding is that the exhibit is to be free of charge.

Mr. BORAH. I think that such a provision ought to be inserted in the joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have no objection to that being done if the Senator has an amendment to that effect which he desires to offer.

Mr. BORAH. I suppose that is what is intended.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the purpose.

Mr. BORAH. In section 4 it is provided that—

> The National Gallery of Art * * * and the works of art contained therein shall be exhibited regularly to the general public.

But under the authority granted the board they would have the power, if they saw fit, to exhibit the works of art to the public for a charge.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. It will be observed by a reading of the joint resolution that the artistic works in the national gallery of art to be exhibited, and the gallery itself, would become a part of the Smithsonian Institution, which is a quasi-Government institution. There is no doubt in my mind that the whole intent and purpose of the joint resolution is that the exhibits kept and displayed there shall be open to the public. The principal purpose of the joint resolution is to make the works of art to be exhibited in the National Gallery of Art available for the general public. I do not think any amendment to that end is necessary, but I am sure there would be no objection to a specific provision to that effect.

Mr. BORAH. Would it be objectionable to insert after the word "public" the words "free of charge"?

Mr. ROBINSON. There would be no objection on my part, and I am sure there would be no objection on the part of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have no objection if the Senator from Idaho desires to offer such an amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Very well. After the word "public", on line 23, page 3, I move to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "free of charge."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho. The purpose, of course, of the proposed legislation is to permit the Government and the public to avail themselves of the gift which is mentioned in the joint resolution and which is designed for the benefit of the country and the public.

Mr. BORAH. I understood that to be the purpose.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it is clearly implied by the joint resolution that the works of art are to be exhibited free of charge, but I have no objection to a clarifying amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on page 2, line 22, I move to strike out the words "Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, subject to the approval of the donor", and insert the word "President", so that it will read:

> The general trustees first taking office shall be chosen by the President, and shall have terms—

And so forth.

Mr. President, the pending joint resolution, as all Senators know, provides for the acceptance of the valuable works of art collected by Mr. Andrew W. Mellon and offered as a gift to the Government of the United States. The gallery, if it shall be constructed, will be known as the national gallery of art and will be similar to the great galleries maintained by other governments in their respective capitals. To my mind, the provision in the joint resolution as it now stands is an extraordinary one. Under it, if the amendment I have suggested shall not be agreed to, the majority of the board set up to administer the proposed national gallery of art will be selected with the approval of the donor; and a subsequent paragraph of the resolution provides that such general trustees shall be self-perpetuating. In other words, if there shall be any vacancy in the board of trustees who are to be in control of the proposed national gallery of art, if any of the members of the board shall die or resign, the original board of trustees will select the successor.

Mr. President, if this gallery were to be known as the Mellon gallery, if it were to be a gallery which was to be supported by the gift of the donor, it seems to me that the provisions suggested in the joint resolution as drafted might very well be accepted; but such is not the case.

This is to become the national gallery of art of the United States of America, located in a public building comparable to other public buildings of the Government at its Capital. It is to be supported in perpetuity by appropriations made from the Treasury of the United States, which the report indicates are estimated to be in the neighborhood of $300,000 a year.

If this is actually to be a national gallery, if it is to be a gallery in which American artists, if they achieve reputation and success in their fields of artistic endeavor, may eventually hope to have their works represented, in my opinion—an opinion which is shared by all the artist organizations with which I have been able to communicate—it would be a great mistake, so far as the encouragement and development of art in this country are concerned, to accept the gift of this gallery and make it a national gallery, supported by the taxpayers' money, and at the same time provide that in perpetuity a majority of the trustees of the institution shall be selected subject to the approval of the donor and shall be self-perpetuating.

Mr. President, in connection with my remarks, I should like to point out that, on page 5, the joint resolution as proposed to be amended reads as follows:

> (b) In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no work of art shall be included in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Art unless they are of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

I wish at the outset to disqualify myself as being in possession of adequate information to pass judgment upon the collection which Mr. Mellon is now offering to the Nation, but I am sufficiently acquainted with such matters to know that the collection was gathered from the point of view of a collector and, therefore, I think I will not be contradicted by any Senator or by anyone elsewhere when I say that the collector of works of art often, if not always, has the point of view of one desiring to acquire works of art which already either because of antiquity or because of rarity, have come to be recognized as possessing qualities which would make them valuable additions to his collection. In other words, without indulging any criticism whatever of the collector, the acquisitions to his collection are made with a view to securing not current works of art, which may in some respects violate the traditions of the past in their effort to work out new technique and new approaches to the subject of art; he is usually primarily interested in selecting works of art the value and reputation of which are already established.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in setting up in the National Capital for the first time a national gallery created for the purpose of exhibiting and housing works of art, not only those given by Mr. Mellon but those which may be acquired in the future, we should provide for it in such a way as that it will afford encouragement to the development of art and stimulate the ambition of artists who are interested in indigenous art and in artistic subjects matter which have relation to the life of America of today and of the future. With all due respect to the donor and to the trustees who will be acceptable to him, under the provisions of section 5 (b) which I have just read, the chances are and the danger is that the trustees will uphold and maintain the idea that new works of art, which have not the antiquity, which have not the rarity, which have not the established commercial value of pictures already in the original gift collection, are not worthy to become or are not of sufficient merit to become a part of the permanent collection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Just what is meant by the words "included in the permanent collection"?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As the joint resolution was originally reported, the Senator will note that it provided that "no work of art shall be exhibited in the national gallery of art", but the committee struck out the words "exhibited in" and the amendment has, I think, already been agreed to substituting the words "included in the permanent collection of", and so forth. I take it this amendment was adopted upon the recommendation of the committee in order to provide, if the board of trustees should see fit, for the temporary exhibition of other works of art which might not, in their judgment, be "of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor" and which could not become a part of the permanent collection of works of art to be hung in the gallery unless they met the requirement specified in line 23 as to being "of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor." I think to that extent the amendment proposed by the committee is desirable, in that at least it gives authority, if the board of trustees should desire to do so, to admit for the purpose of temporary exhibition paintings which might not meet the requirement as to being "of similar high standard and quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor." However, I insist that if there is to be created a national gallery of art, which is to be supported by appropriations from the Treasury amounting to $300,000 annually, the Congress should take great care to make certain that American artists and contemporary artists, if their works of art are of sufficient merit and quality, may hope to have them likewise included in the permanent collection in the national gallery of art in the Capital of their country.

In other words, as I see it, we should seize this opportunity to provide a stimulus to our native art. I fear that under the provisions of the joint resolution as reported, if they be adopted without amendment, instead of this gift becoming the nucleus of a collection in the national gallery, it will act as a deterrent and discouragement to American artists, rather than as an encouragement, which I do not think should be the result so long as this gallery is to be a national gallery and is to be supported by money of the taxpayers appropriated by the Congress.

Mr. President, in this connection it may be of interest to Senators, who may have some question as to my qualifications to pass on a subject of this nature, to know the attitude of some of the American artists of the country toward the joint resolution as it now stands.

First of all I draw attention to a telegram received from Stuart Davis, national executive secretary of the American Artists' Congress, 100 West Thirteenth Street, New York City. I may say to Senators who are interested that my information is that the American Artists' Congress is made up of some 600 or 700 artists of the United States and is recognized as one of the organizations qualified to speak for artists of attainment in this country.

Mr. Davis' telegram reads:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 28, 1937.

Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

American Artists' Congress, national organization of 650 outstanding artists devoted to achievement of democracy in culture, urges your support in amending House Joint Resolution 217 on National Gallery of Art. The bill at present provides for a self-perpetuating board without responsibility to any agency outside itself. It is improper administration for National Gallery maintained by Government funds. We urge amendment to make board of control responsible to American people with provision for organizational representation by artists on it. Provisions of present bill are undemocratic and contrary to progressive policies of present administration in relation to responsibility of Government to art and culture.

STUART DAVIS,
National Executive Secretary American Artists' Congress.

I have also a telegram from Jerome Klein, art editor of the New York Evening Post, reading as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 28, 1937.

Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I urge your attention to the undemocratic administrative provisions of House Joint Resolution 217, which refers to National Gallery of Art. Young American artists must have a voice in determining future course of American culture. House Joint Resolution 217 in present form denies them voice in this case by perpetuating the voice of the donor in the form of a self-perpetuating board of control. The gift adds to the Nation's cultural wealth, but the American people and American artists must actually control the policy of an institution maintained by public funds and labeled "National Gallery of Art." An amendment to the joint resolution to guarantee this control is necessary.

JEROME KLEIN,
Art Editor, New York Post.

I have also a telegram from George Picken, instructor of the Art Students' League of New York City, reading as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., March 1, 1937.

Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE,
The United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Present proposals for administration of National Gallery of Art contained in House Joint Resolution 217 are undemocratic and wholly inadequate for an institution supported by public funds. I ask that you give your liberal support in introducing an amendment to this joint resolution which will give the artists and people of United States a voice in policy of this proposed national gallery.

GEORGE PICKEN,
Instructor, Art Students' League.

I have also telegrams from Niles Spencer and from William Zorach, both of New York City, reading as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 28, 1937.

Senator LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Respectfully urge your attention to bill (House joint resolution), for the reason that it provides undemocratic control of an institution which is maintained by public funds.

NILES SPENCER,

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 28, 1937.

Senator ROBERT LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

House Joint Resolution 217, believe provisions of this bill are undemocratic and improper for an institution supported by public funds. Favor an amendment which will allow the people of the United States to retain control of the policies of this National Gallery of Art.

WILLIAM ZORACH.

I have also resolutions adopted by the American Artists' Congress, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolutions are as follows:

AMERICAN ARTISTS' CONGRESS,
100 West Thirteenth Street, New York City.

1. Whereas House Joint Resolution 217 permits the A. W. Mellon Educational Charitable Trust, referred to as the donor, to put up a building called the National Gallery of Art on a certain site; and

2. Whereas this bill also provides that a bureau be set up within the Smithsonian Institution to administer the National Gallery of Art and the collection of art works given by the donor to be housed in the gallery, with all future additions and transactions; and

3. Whereas this bureau is to be administered by a board of trustees composed of four officers of the United States Government and five other persons, known as general trustees, who must not be officers or employees of the United States Government; and

4. Whereas the first five general trustees shall be chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, subject to the approval of the donor; and

5. Whereas the first five general trustees thereafter become a self-perpetuating body, filling expired terms or vacancies by a majority of its own membership; and

6. Whereas three members of the board of trustees are empowered to transact business as a quorum; and

7. Whereas the United States Government is required to provide funds for the upkeep, cost of operation, and administrative expenses of the National Gallery of Art; and

8. Whereas the board of trustees has complete power to make all decisions concerning the business affairs and artistic policy of the National Gallery of Art; and

9. Whereas their decisions are not subject to review by any officer or agency other than a court of law; and

10. Whereas this bill provides that no works inferior in quality to the original collection given by the donor shall be exhibited in the National Gallery of Art: Therefore be it

Resolved:

1. That the National Gallery of Art, maintained by public funds, as provided in House Joint Resolution 217, properly belongs to the people of the United States, who are entitled to a direct voice in its administration.

2. That the administrative provisions of this bill, which sets up a self-perpetuating board without responsibility to any agency other than itself, deprives the American people of their right to a controlling voice in the policy of the National Gallery of Art.

3. That the bill should insure that the National Gallery should adopt a progressive attitude toward the encouragement of contemporary art as exemplified by the existing Federal art projects.

4. To achieve the democratic control and progressive artistic policy which this bill makes impossible it is necessary to amend it.

AN AMENDMENT OF A JOINT RESOLUTION (H. J. RES. 217) OF FEBRUARY 12, 1937

Section 2 (b), page 2, shall be amended to read as follows:

"The general trustees first taking office shall be selected as follows:

"Two shall be appointed by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, subject to the approval of the donor.

"Three shall be elected at a joint election conducted by delegates of the leading active organizations of artists of the United States, such as the National Society of Mural Painters; the American Artists' Congress; the National Academy of Design; the artists' unions; the American Society of Painters, Sculptors and Engravers; the National Sculpture Society; and shall have terms expiring one each on July 1 of 1939, 1941, 1943, 1945, and 1947, as designated by the Board of Regents. A successor shall be similarly elected for terms expiring 4 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was chosen, except that a successor chosen to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of such term shall be chosen only for the remainder of such term."

Section 4–C, page 4, line 24, the following shall be eliminated: "and the original appointment to each such office shall be subject to the approval of the donor."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have a letter from Mr. Max Weber, chairman of the American Artists Congress, from which I quote as follows:

From a cultural and social viewpoint Mr. Andrew Mellon's presentation of his famous art collection to the people of the United States is a great contribution to the spiritual and aesthetic side of the life of our Nation, but since this great art collection becomes the property of our great Nation, with the understanding that the Government shall provide for the maintenance and guardianship of the museum in which these masterpieces are to be housed, it seems but logical and fair that the recipient of this gift, and the responsibilities that naturally go with it, shall also have the privilege and right to select one or more members of the board of trustees of this national museum.

Mr. President, if the amendment which I have offered should prevail, the five general trustees, aside from ex-officio trustees, who are the Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, would be selected by the President of the United States. I have made that suggestion because I believe the President of the United States, representing the whole people, is the proper official to make the selection of the trustees. He is, it seems to me, the one person who could be expected to be in touch with the development of art and who could be trusted to appoint to this governing board men who would be representative of American artists.

In this connection I wish to invite attention to the fact that the joint resolution as pending provides that no officer or employees of the Federal Government shall be eligible to be chosen as a general trustee, and my amendment does not affect that provision.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that serious consideration may be given by the Senate to the resolutions I have presented, since I think the subject matter is one of very great importance to the future cultural life of our country.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Wisconsin of course understands that under the existing law the President does not appoint the members of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I realize that, Mr. President; and I have not made any change in the set-up of the administrative features of this joint resolution aside from providing, if my amendment shall be agreed to, the five general trustees shall be appointed by the President, instead of being appointed by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution subject to the approval of the donor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. As I understand from reading the record and from some other studies of the subject, Mr. Mellon makes the offer of this gift upon certain conditions; and among the conditions is that the board shall be constituted as is contemplated by the proposed legislation—if I am in error about that, it will appear hereafter—and that one of the purposes of requiring that the general members of the board, other than the ex-officio members, first appointed shall be approved by Mr. Mellon, is to make certain that there will not be permanently placed in the national art gallery paintings of an inferior character.

The question I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin is whether he is informed as to the effect of his amendment if it should be incorporated in the joint resolution; whether it might defeat the gift.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Arkansas that, so far as I know, no negotiations were conducted between Mr. Mellon and anyone representing the Government, so to speak, in connection with this gift.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. Does not the Senator recall the exchange of letters between the President of the United States and Mr. Mellon with respect to this matter?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do; but I say that there has been no negotiation in the sense that anyone has inquired whether or not any change could be made in the terms of Mr. Mellon's gift.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator will find that the subject was gone into rather fully before the joint resolution was drafted and that the joint resolution was drafted pursuant to an understanding which represented a tentative agreement between the agents of Mr. Mellon and agents of the Smithsonian Institution and of other governmental agencies, including the President.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the joint resolution was drawn in the Department of Justice in conformity with the exchange of letters.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I recall now that the Attorney General collaborated in the negotiations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is true, as the Senator states, that Mr. Mellon offered this gift under certain terms and conditions, that those terms and conditions were considered, and that they were accepted; but I think I am correctly informed that no effort has been made by anyone to ascertain whether Mr. Mellon would be willing to accept any modification in those terms and conditions. If there is any question about that, so far as I am concerned, I shall be very happy to have the joint resolution laid over, so that the Senator from Texas or someone else may have an opportunity to ascertain the attitude of Mr. Mellon.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas is prepared to answer that question when the Senator from Wisconsin shall have concluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Since the Senator from Arkansas has raised this question, I desire at this time to go into an aspect of this matter upon which I had not intended to touch, namely, the situation so far as these paintings are concerned, and the tax case which is pending before the Board of Tax Appeals.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator what the tax situation has to do with this joint resolution. Will the Senator tell us?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I think I can do so. I have already stated that it was not my intention to go into this phase of the matter; but I wish to point out certain aspects of the situation, because the Senator from Arkansas has indicated an apprehension that this gift will be withdrawn if the Congress or anyone else exercises any discretion as to the terms upon which we are willing to accept it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I made that suggestion in the utmost good faith.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know the Senator did.

Mr. ROBINSON. And I made it with knowledge of the fact, both as a lawyer and from my experience as a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, that any substantial disregard of the conditions upon which a gift is made may defeat the gift.

The members of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution are frequently called upon to accept or reject offers, oftentimes relating to property of great value, because of the conditions upon which the offers are based; and in some instances there have been efforts to vary the terms of the offers, with the result that the efforts have led to litigation, and in some instances have discouraged gifts.

This gift relates to very valuable property. The total value of the gift is enormous. It is said to approximate $55,000,000. An opportunity is afforded, with very slight cost to the Government, to secure and maintain here in the National Capital, where visitors not only from our own country but from every part of the world will be privileged to observe and study them, great works of art; and I should be very reluctant to write into this proposed statute a provision which would defeat the project, particularly in view of the fact that I do not believe there is anything unreasonable or very difficult in the terms of the gift.

It will be recalled that when Smithson first made his gift and started the great scientific institution which is recognized by scientists throughout the world as perhaps the most important in existence, he attached a condition to his gift, and it was somewhat in the nature of the conditions sought to be attached to the Mellon gift. He desired to divorce the Smithsonian Institution as much as possible from political control; and the plan which now exists was worked out, and I think has operated very well indeed. The Smithsonian Institution has actually received gifts amounting to many million dollars, and in the case of every one of them that I can recall there have been attached conditions. Some of them have occasioned quite a little study and anxiety on the part of the Board of Regents.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield right there, I think I can give him something that will be of interest.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. CONNALLY. I quote from the letter of Mr. Mellon to the President under date of February 16 of the present year. I shall be very brief.

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall be very glad to hear what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Mellon says:

> The bill provides that the proposed gallery shall be constituted a bureau of the Smithsonian Institution, and that the maintenance and administration of the gallery shall be by a separate board of trustees, of whom four hold office ex officio and five, general trustees, shall be private citizens of the United States. This conforms to the principal, and I may say, the most essential condition of the gift offer outlined in my letter to the President, and as stated therein it is intended solely for the purpose of safeguarding the high standard of quality of future acquisitions for the collection and to insure the efficient administration of the proposed gallery.

In other words, if we do not accept the gift on these terms, we do not accept it; that is all.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true; and I wish to add to what I have been saying the further suggestion that, in my judgment, the amendment which the Senator from Wisconsin has offered would throw the Smithsonian Institution and all its holdings into the very greatest confusion and probably would involve it in litigation which would last for many years. I shall now give the reason for that statement.

The national gallery of art is to be a part of the Smithsonian Institution. It is to be in a sense, though not directly, under the Smithsonian Institution. The Board of Regents will not directly control it, because a separate board is to be set up.

Mr. CONNALLY. But the Smithsonian Institution is to own the gallery, and the title to the land is to be in it.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is to own the gallery. To provide for the appointment by political authority of the directors would, in my judgment, result in great embarrassment to the Smithsonian Institution itself. It might also, as already appears from the statement of the Senator from Texas and from some suggestions I have made, defeat the proposed gift from Mr. Mellon.

I can readily understand that there are many artists and that there are many citizens who would like to have this gift without limitation, without qualification, and without condition; but when a gift is being made, the donor has the right to impose any legal conditions he chooses to impose, and those who are tendered the gift have the right to accept or to reject. But I do not think that those who receive the gift would have the right to attach conditions known to be obnoxious to the donor or objectionable to him in any way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I stated at the outset of my remarks that if this gallery were to be known as the Mellon gallery, as the Smithsonian was named after Mr. Smithson, if it were to be a quasi-public institution, I should have no objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the Senator's point last made is against his conclusion, although, of course, I know the Senator from Wisconsin has given study to this subject. We have under the Smithsonian Institution what is known as the Freer Gallery. I see other members of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution in the Chamber at this time. Usually when a man makes a gift of this sort he likes to have his name associated with it. He likes to believe that for all time to come his name will be carved on marble and on the monument which his generosity has erected, so that those who come after him may associate the great achievement with his generosity. That has been done in many instances in regard to gifts made to the Smithsonian Institution and accepted by that organization.

In the case before us the donor has been more modest. So far as I can discover from the record, he has not asked for any mention of himself in connection with the building or the works of art. Of course, it will be remembered by students of art that he made this gift; but it is not to be known as the Mellon gallery, and to my mind the fact that Mr. Mellon did not ask that it should be so named, that he waived that condition, is one reason why we should be ready to make an advance to meet other conditions which he does attach.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have to disagree most emphatically with the conclusion the Senator from Arkansas draws, because the whole point of the amendment which I have offered lies in the fact that the proposed gallery is to be known as the national gallery of art, and is going to be looked upon, not only by visitors, but by artists all over the United States, as our national gallery of art.

It seems to me that under those conditions we should be certain that the institution is to be governed in such a way as to offer encouragement to American artists and to contemporary art in this country. I think that is one of the chief reasons why, if this is to become the national gallery of art, if it is to receive an annual appropriation of $300,000 a year of the taxpayers' money for its maintenance, it should be controlled by representatives of the people, and not by a board of self-perpetuating trustees who must meet the approval of the donor.

To return to the question as to whether or not the gift will be withdrawn if any alterations are made in the terms stipulated by the donor, I doubt very seriously whether the gift would be withdrawn if the Congress should see fit to exercise its privilege and prerogative of providing certain terms and conditions of acceptance so far as the Government itself is concerned. I entertain this opinion because of the estate-tax rates now in force in the United States. It is a matter of common knowledge that collections of this kind are not desirable parts of large estates under the tax rates which have now been established. So, I believe firmly that we can exercise our judgment in this matter, if the judgment of the Senate is that it is desirable to make any change in the terms under which the gift is to be accepted, and I submit again that I believe firmly that it is desirable that this suggested change be made, for, if we are to have a national gallery, supported by Federal funds it should be under public and not under private control.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I desire very briefly to reply to some of the suggestions of the Senator from Wisconsin. Let me suggest to him in the very beginning that while this collection is denominated in the joint resolution as the "National Gallery of Art", it is a fact that the nucleus of it, and practically all of it, will consist of the Mellon collection.

Another bill is pending, I may say to the Senator, a bill introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and a bill of the same import in the House of Representatives, to provide, supplementary to the establishment of the proposed gallery, an additional gallery of art, in connection with the Smithsonian Institution, for current and new and all sorts of productions of art.

I point out to the Senator from Wisconsin, furthermore, that the particular measure before us recognizes that already in the Smithsonian there is a collection of art. Subdivision (c), on page 6, reads:

> The existing bureau of the Smithsonian Institution now designated as a national gallery of art shall hereafter be known as the National Collection of Fine Arts.

This bureau contains other exhibits of an artistic nature, both good and indifferent, and is a place where artists may, as I understand, exhibit their work. There are two very vital conditions fixed by Mr. Mellon in making his gift, first, that the particular collection which he is giving to the Government shall be maintained at a very high standard from an artistic standpoint. The second is that the board which is to manage the art gallery shall consist, as set out in the joint resolution, of four ex-officio members, and of five others, who shall form a self-perpetuating body of a nonpolitical character.

If we were making an appropriation for the purchase of these pictures, of course the Senator from Wisconsin could very appropriately suggest that we control the collection and handle it as we might see fit. But let me say to him that Mr. Mellon is not only making a gift of a collection of pictures, which the testimony before the committee showed cost $30,000,000, but which probably now is worth $50,000,000, but he is also making a gift of $10,000,000 for the erection of a building to house the collection, and all that he asks is that the board be composed as set out in the joint resolution, and that his collection be maintained at a high standard of art.

In addition to that, Mr. Mellon gives $5,000,000 as an endowment fund, the income from which is to be applied to the maintenance of the gallery or to the purchase of new works of art.

It is up to the Congress to say whether we want to accept the gift or whether we do not. The House of Representatives has passed without amendment a bill identical with the joint resolution before us I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, which handles the legislation.

As the Senator from Arkansas has very well pointed out, the Smithsonian Institution has over a long period of years managed its affairs through a nonpolitical board. Personally, I have no objection to the present President of the United States making the appointments, but I can readily apprehend the desires of the donor in providing that the board shall be under the general control of the Smithsonian, and dissociated from any character of politics, or any character of pressure to get into this gallery works of art of particular individuals or particular groups. It does seem to me that if the Congress wants this collection it ought to enact the legislation as drafted.

I desire to have inserted in the RECORD the correspondence between the President of the United States and Mr. Mellon with respect to the proposed gift, a letter from the President dated the first day of February 1937, to the Congress transmitting the correspondence, a letter from Mr. Mellon to the President dated December 22, 1936, a letter from the President to Mr. Mellon dated December 26, 1936, another letter from Mr. Mellon to the President dated December 31, 1936, and a letter from the President to Mr. Mellon dated January 1, 1937. I should like to have these letters appear in the RECORD in the chronological order in which they were written.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GILLETTE in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES TRANSMITTING HEREWITH A RECOMMENDATION FOR APPROPRIATE LEGISLATION TO EFFECT THE ACCEPTANCE OF A GIFT FROM ANDREW W. MELLON

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 1, 1937.

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the consideration of the Congress the matter of enacting appropriate legislation to effect the acceptance by the United States of the magnificent gift referred to in my recent exchange of letters with Mr. Andrew W. Mellon. The conditions under which the gift is tendered are set out in the correspondence, copies of which are transmitted herewith.

The works of art thus offered to the Government constitute one of the finest and most valuable collections in existence, containing only objects of the highest standard of quality.

It is with a keen sense of appreciation of the generous purpose of the donor and the satisfaction that comes with the knowledge that such a splendid collection will be placed at the seat of our Government for the benefit and enjoyment of our people during all the years to come, that I submit this matter to the Congress.

The Attorney General and the trustees of the Smithsonian Institute have conferred with representatives of the donor and will be glad to discuss the necessary legislation with the appropriate committees.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

DECEMBER 22, 1936.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Over a period of many years I have been acquiring important and rare paintings and sculpture with the idea that ultimately they would become the property of the people of the United States and be made available to them in a national art gallery to be maintained in the city of Washington for the purpose of encouraging and developing a study of the fine arts.

I have within the last few years transferred these paintings and sculptures to trustees with responsibility for carrying out this purpose and have given them full power and authority to deed these works of art to a national gallery if and when such an institution shall assume and be prepared to carry out the purposes intended. In addition, I have given to the trustees securities ample to erect a gallery building of sufficient size to house these works of art and to permit the indefinite growth of the collection under a conservative policy regulating acquisitions.

Such a gallery would be for the use and benefit of the general public; and it is my hope that it may attract gifts from other citizens who may in the future desire to contribute works of art of the highest quality to form a great national collection. In connection, therefore, with the intended gift, I shall stipulate that the proposed building shall not bear my name, but shall be known as The National Art Gallery or by such other name as may appropriately identify it as a gallery of art of the National Government.

In order to carry out this purpose, and with the approval of the other trustees, I wish to propose a plan to give the art collection which I have brought together to the Smithsonian Institution or to the United States Government for the benefit of the people of this country, and also to erect or cause to be erected on public land a suitable building for a national gallery of art, the design and materials of which shall be subject to the approval of the Fine Arts Commission. Mr. John Russell Pope, of New York, has been employed as architect to study this project and will furnish designs for such a building.

The location of such a gallery is a matter that must be given most careful consideration. It should not only be readily accessible to those wishing to visit the gallery, but should also be located at a point with sufficient surrounding property, under control of public authorities, to protect it from undesirable encroachments. In my own opinion and that of others who are familiar with the general plan of Washington, it would seem that a site on the Mall would most nearly meet these requirements; and the designation of a definite site, therefore, for the building on public land will be incorporated in the offer of the gift to the Government.

In addition to the gift of the art collection and a building in which it and similar collections may be housed and displayed, I plan also to establish an endowment fund for the proposed gallery, the income from which shall be used to pay the annual salaries of a director, assistant director, secretary, and curators of the gallery, and for possible future art acquisitions. The upkeep of the building and other administrative expenses and cost of operation would be provided in appropriations to be made by Congress, as for the other units of the Smithsonian Institution.

The orderly and efficient administration of the proposed gallery and its policy respecting acquisitions are both imperative considerations affecting the establishment of such a gallery. I would suggest that the affairs of the proposed gallery should be managed by a competent and separate board of trustees acting for it as a unit of the Smithsonian Institution and that they be empowered to make bylaws and regulations governing its operations.

It is of the greatest importance that future acquisitions of works of art, whether by gift or purchase, shall be limited to objects of the highest standard of quality, so that the collections to be housed in the proposed building shall not be marred by the introduction of art that is not the best of its type. I have tried to adhere to this standard in the collection which I have made. That collection is representative of most of the great masters of western Europe and includes outstanding works of art which I acquired from the Hermitage Gallery in Russia. It also contains Renaissance sculptures, including most of those formerly in the Dreyfuss collection in Paris; and there is, in addition, a large assemblage of American portraits from the Clarke and other collections, which would be suitable for a national portrait gallery.

By reason of the rarity and importance of these works of art, the general character of the collection is such that it will furnish the nucleus of a great national collection and will give our country at once a national gallery that will rank with the other great galleries of the world. In making the collection I have placed emphasis on quality rather than quantity; and the terms under which the gift would be made are intended solely for the purpose of safeguarding the collection and insuring efficient management, so that the highest standard of quality will always be maintained in the art to be displayed in the gallery.

If this plan meets with your approval, I will submit a formal offer of gift, stating specifically the terms thereof, and the erection of the building may proceed immediately upon the acceptance of such offer and the passage of necessary legislation by Congress. Appropriate instruments of conveyance and gift will then be executed.

Sincerely yours,

A. W. MELLON.

DECEMBER 26, 1936.

Hon. A. W. MELLON,
730 Fifteenth Street, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MELLON: When my uncle handed me your letter of December 22 I was not only completely taken by surprise but was delighted by your very wonderful offer to the people of the United States.

This was especially so because for many years I have felt the need for a national gallery of art in the Capital. Your proposed gift does more than furnish what you call a "nucleus", because I am confident that the collections you have been making are of the first importance and will place the Nation well up in the first rank.

Furthermore, your offer of an adequate building and an endowment fund means permanence in this changing world.

Because the formal offer calls for specific statement of the terms and will have to be worked out before any request is made by me to the Congress for the necessary legislation, may I suggest that you, or whoever you may care to designate, should come to see me some afternoon this week?

Also, I think that we should discuss the formal announcement and the terms of it.

With my renewed appreciation of your letter, believe me,

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

DECEMBER 31, 1936.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I wish to thank you for your kind letter of December 26 and greatly appreciate the interest you have shown in my plan for the establishment of a national gallery of art at Washington.

For the purpose of carrying this plan into effect, I hereby offer to give the art collection, which I have brought together, to the Smithsonian Institution or to the United States Government for the benefit of the people of the United States and to construct a suitable building in which to exhibit this collection and other works of art of like quality which other citizens may in the future contribute to the national collection.

In connection with the offer which I have made on behalf of myself and the other trustees, who have the responsibility of carrying out this purpose, and in accordance with the suggestion in your letter, I set forth below an outline of the definite terms and conditions under which the gallery is to be erected and, together with the art collection, is to be given to the Smithsonian Institution or to the Government of the United States, all of which conditions are intended for the efficient management of the gallery and for safeguarding the high standard of quality which should be maintained in the art to be displayed therein.

First. The gallery shall not bear my name, but shall be known as the National Gallery of Art, or by such other name as may appropriately identify it as a gallery of art of the National Government, to which the entire public shall forever have access, subject only to reasonable regulations to be from time to time established.

Second. The gallery to be erected will be of suitable design and ample capacity, the plans of which are being studied by Mr. John Russell Pope, of New York, who has been employed as architect and will furnish designs for the building. Such designs and the materials of the building are to be subject to the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts. The scope and plan of the building as at present developed by Mr. Pope will call for an estimated expenditure of eight to nine million dollars.

Third. The location of the building shall be on a site to be set aside by Congress, on the north side of the Mall (and in conformity with the plan thereof), between Fourth and Seventh Streets NW., with frontage on Constitution Avenue, in the District of Columbia. In connection with the setting aside of the site for the building, it is to be provided that part of Sixth Street shall be closed from Constitution Avenue to Independence Avenue, and that the Mall building space, on the north between Third and Fourth Streets NW., shall be reserved for future extensions of the National Gallery of Art. The plans for the rearrangement of the street are to be subject to the approval of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission.

Fourth. The regents of the Smithsonian Institution shall be authorized by Congress to erect, cause to be erected, or grant permission for the erection of the gallery building on the site hereinbefore mentioned, and to accept on behalf of the Government and the people of the United States from the donor trustees, under the terms and conditions herein provided, the gallery building as well as the art collection hereby offered to be given.

Fifth. The upkeep of the gallery building and other administrative expenses and costs of operation and functioning of the gallery for the public purpose for which it is designed shall be provided for annually in appropriations to be made by Congress, as for the other units of the Smithsonian Institution.

Sixth. It shall be provided that the gallery and its property shall be controlled and its affairs managed by a competent, self-perpetuating board of nine trustees, of whom five shall be named originally by the donor, with the approval of the regents of the Smithsonian Institution, the remaining members of the board to be ex-officio members and shall be the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, or such other governmental officials as may be agreed upon. The board shall act for the Smithsonian Institution as one of its units, but shall be empowered to make bylaws and regulations governing the organization and operation of the gallery. The bylaws and regulations to be adopted by the board of trustees shall have the approval of the donor, and among other things shall provide for the employment of a director, an assistant director, a secretary, and curators of the gallery, their qualifications and responsibilities. Such officers shall be appointed originally only upon the approval of the donor.

Seventh. The board of trustees shall be authorized and empowered to accept, receive, hold, and administer gifts, devises, or bequests of any real or personal property, except as Congress may hereafter specifically impose, either absolutely or in trust, for the benefit of or in connection with the gallery, its collections, or its functions, and the board shall have the power to prescribe, by rules and regulations, or otherwise, the terms and conditions upon which such property may be acquired or received by the gallery.

Eighth. The board of trustees shall by regulation provide that no acquisitions shall be made in addition to the collection of paintings and sculptures hereby offered, whether by gift or purchase, except objects of a similar high standard of quality to those of the present collection, so that the collection to be housed in the gallery shall not be marred by the introduction of art that is not the best of its type; and further to this end, they shall be empowered in the bylaws to impose reasonable conditions and rules governing the acceptance of objects of art.

Ninth. If this offer has your approval and that of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, it is stipulated that the erection of the building will proceed immediately upon the acceptance of the offer and the passage of the necessary legislation by Congress. Instruments of conveyance and gift will be executed upon these happenings. On completion of the building, it shall be turned over to the proper governmental authorities with the collection of paintings and sculptures hereby offered, to be administered by the above-mentioned board of trustees.

In addition to the gift of the art collection and a building in which it and similar collections may be housed and displayed, I further propose to establish an endowment fund for the gallery, the income from which shall be used to pay the annual salaries of a director, assistant director, a secretary, and a curator of the gallery, and for future art acquisitions, but not for the upkeep of the building and other administrative expenses and salaries, which I have hereinbefore stipulated shall be provided in appropriations to be made by Congress. The amount of such endowment fund and the terms and conditions governing its operation will be subject to further consideration and will be stated in the instrument creating the fund.

The exact form of these gifts and the details of carrying them into execution are questions that can be agreed upon by counsel representing the Smithsonian Institution or the Government and myself.

Very sincerely yours,

A. W. MELLON.

JANUARY 1, 1937.

Hon. A. W. MELLON,
730 Fifteenth Street, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MELLON: The outline of the terms and conditions under which the proposed National Gallery of Art is to be erected and maintained is admirably set forth in the letter you handed to me at our conference yesterday.

In accordance with our understanding, I am referring the correspondence to the Attorney General and the appropriate representatives of the Smithsonian Institution.

They will be able, I am sure, to work out, in conference with you, the details of this fine project and prepare the necessary papers, including a draft of enabling legislation.

I shall be happy to submit the matter with a favorable recommendation, to the Congress at the first opportunity.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I now desire to quote again from the letter of Mr. Mellon under date of February 16, 1937, to Representative KENT E. KELLER, chairman of the Committee on the Library, House of Representatives, on this very point as to the board of directors. I quote from that letter:

> The bill provides that the proposed gallery shall be constituted a bureau of the Smithsonian Institution, and that the maintenance and administration of the gallery shall be by a separate board of trustees, of whom four hold office ex officio, and five, general trustees, shall be private citizens of the United States.

This is the particular language to which I invite attention:

> This conforms to the principal, and I say, the most essential condition of the gift offer outlined in my letter to the President, and as stated therein it is intended solely for the purpose of safeguarding the high standard of quality of future acquisitions for the collection and to insure the efficient administration of the proposed gallery.
> It was my intention that the gallery should be one of the units of the Smithsonian Institution, the ownership of the building and collection to be given the people to be entrusted to it, but that the operation and management of the gallery would be mingled as little as possible with affairs of that Institution or with the affairs of the Government.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. May I inquire whether the people will have anything in the world to say about the management of the institution?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator has not been present during the discussion.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; I was in the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator that we have been discussing that question here for quite a little while, and if the Senator will revert to the joint resolution he will find that it provides that this collection shall become a part of the Smithsonian Institution, but that it shall be governed by a board of trustees composed of four ex-officio members and five members who shall be nominated with the approval of the donor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In other words, we have a sort of a self-perpetuating board of trustees?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct, and that thereafter the board of trustees shall be self-perpetuating.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But that the people of the United States will pay for the upkeep of the institution thereafter?

Mr. CONNALLY. Partially. Mr. Mellon leaves $5,000,000 as an endowment, but that will probably not be adequate, and the people will pay whatever additional amount is needed for maintenance.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has offered an amendment to provide that the Government of the United States shall have something to say about the appointment of the trustees.

Mr. CONNALLY. Not "something", but considerable.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I should like to see a copy of the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Wisconsin is near the Senator.

Mr. President, I was talking about the people of the United States. What do the people of the United States get out of this? They get the art gallery. They get free admission to it. Nobody can take that away from them. It is said that the Government is going to appropriate some $300,000 a year. Yes; that is true. For what? Not for Mr. Mellon; not to the donor, but to make available this great collection to the people of America, to the humble and the poor and the weak and the powerful and the rich—all of them.

Refuse the gift if you will. Refuse the gift. Tell Mr. Mellon, "Take back your pictures, Mr. Mellon. Take back your works of art, and store them away somewhere in your own private collection. Leave it to some private organization. Leave it under your own name in some monument to your memory, restricted and hedged about with all kinds of conditions." Mr. Mellon says, "No; I want to give this collection to the people of the United States. I want to make available to them the works of the great masters."

Whether a man be educated or whether he be ignorant, whether he be cultured, or whether he have only the elemental passions within him, when he walks through a great gallery of art there are things which speak to him from the conception of the artists that do not need to be transcribed upon the written page. But Senators would say, "No; we will not take the gift. It comes soiled. It comes all stained over because Mr. Mellon once looked upon it. He has seen these pictures. He has valued them. He has gathered them together; and, forsooth, because they come from the hands of Mellon, we will not let our people look upon them. Take them back, Mr. Mellon."

What does Mr. Mellon ask? He says, "Here are pictures that cost me $30,000,000. Take them gratis. Here is $10,000,000 more to erect a building to house them. Take it gratis. Here is $5,000,000 more as an endowment to aid in maintaining the establishment and providing for new pictures if you desire." And what does he ask? "All I ask is that this collection, housed in this building which I give you, this particular collection—" he does not put any condition on other collections that we may gather, but as to this collection he says: "All I ask is that it be maintained at a high standard of excellence. I do not request conditions as to every detail of management. No; I trust the Smithsonian about that. All I request is that this board be set up as set forth in the joint resolution, and that it then be self-perpetuating, without political control, without the pressure of this group or that group or the other group."

That is all Mr. Mellon asks. So it is up to the Senate of the United States to accept the gift on those terms or to reject it. If you do not want it, say so; but if you do want it, be gracious enough to accept it on these two little conditions imposed by the donor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield gladly to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator think it would be ungracious of the Government to ask the donor whether he would agree to some little modification of the control of the board of trustees in perpetuity?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator evidently was not here when I read from the donor's letter. Was the Senator here then?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was not.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall read it again, Mr. President.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, before the Senator reads it, may I suggest that this is apparently a matter which is to cover the management of this gift for all time to come.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am advised that there have been no negotiations of any kind on behalf of the United States as to the terms under which it is to be accepted. Is that correct?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know what the Senator calls "negotiations." We had hearings before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The representatives of Mr. Mellon were there. They testified fully as to what the conditions were. The Department of Justice was called in. It drew the joint resolution after negotiations back and forth with the representatives of Mr. Mellon, and with the view to carrying out the wishes of the President and Mr. Mellon, as expressed in that correspondence. If that be "negotiations", then there have been negotiations; but if "negotiations" are playing at a game of "I want this and you must give me that, and if you don't do this I won't play"—if that is "negotiations", there have been none so far as I know.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Were there any discussions as to the propriety of turning over the designation of a majority of the board of trustees to the donor and apparently to his successors in perpetuity?

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator will let me read what I am going to read here, I think it will answer his question.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CONNALLY. I call this language to the attention of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, and, I hope, the members of some of the rest of the committees who I hope are present, so that they can hear what I am about to read. I read from the letter of February 16, 1937, from Mr. Mellon to Representative KELLER, chairman of the Committee on the Library of the House of Representatives, which had this legislation under consideration. I quote:

> The bill provides that the proposed gallery shall be constituted a bureau of the Smithsonian Institution, and that the maintenance and administration of the gallery shall be by a separate board of trustees, of whom four hold office ex officio, and five, general trustees, shall be private citizens of the United States.

I hope the Senator from Wyoming will now give heed:

> This—

The construction of the board of directors—

> This conforms to the principal—

"p-a-l"; not "p-l-e." I continue—> and I may say the most essential condition of the gift offer outlined in my letter to the President, and, as stated therein, it is intended solely for the purpose of safeguarding the high standard of quality of future acquisitions for the collection and to insure the efficient administration of the proposed gallery.

> It was my intention that the gallery should be one of the units of the Smithsonian Institution, the ownership of the building and collection to be given the people to be entrusted to it, but that the operation and management of the gallery would be mingled as little as possible with affairs of that Institution or with the affairs of the Government.

Does that answer the Senator?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator from Texas that it explains the reasons why the proposal has been put up in this form, but it does not at all answer the objections which have been made.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; it does not answer the objections which have been made. I know it does not answer the Senator's objections; but the Senator's objections cannot be answered, as I understand, unless Mr. Mellon removes all restrictions, and says, "Here, take the gallery; take the $10,000,000 for the building; take $5,000,000 more, and do with it as you please."

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I would not say that, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt. I read now from the joint resolution:

> The board shall be composed as follows: The Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, ex officio.

Obviously, now, we have four members of the very highest standards upon whose judgment and discretion I think the donor could very well rely, four members who might be trusted not to admit to the gallery a matter which should not be admitted; but then we find the concluding part of the sentence reading:

> And five general trustees who shall be citizens of the United States, to be chosen as hereinafter provided.

The provision to which that clause refers is to be found in line 21, on page 2, reading:

> The general trustees first taking office shall be chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, subject to the approval of the donor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask a question in that connection. The joint resolution provides "subject to the approval of the donor", but it does not provide "subject to the approval of the donor, his successors, heirs", and so forth. I suppose that when the donor shall have passed away no approval will be necessary.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator it is only the initial board that the donor may approve.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I thought.

Mr. CONNALLY. And when he dies, which I suppose will not be over a half a century from now, the board will reappoint its successors.

Mr. BORAH. So I understood.

Mr. CONNALLY. The influence of Mr. Mellon on the board, let me say to those who fear his influence, will not exist very long, because, under the joint resolution, his approval is required only of the initial board, and when that board is thus appointed the trustees appointed by the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution the several trustees select their own successors.

Let us consider this terrible provision. What is it? After all, who appoints the several trustees? The Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. It is said that Mr. Mellon must approve them, but they must also be approved by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. Can they not be trusted? The Senator from Wyoming is willing to trust the board members in one particular, but not to select the members of the art gallery board.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator is too wise a man to make that statement. That to which we are objecting here is the proposal to establish a board to manage this institution, a majority of whom are selected by the donor, and to permit that majority then, throughout all time, to continue to appoint their successors. There can be no question that the joint resolution as the Senator has brought it upon the floor provides for perpetual control of the proposed national gallery of art outside the hands of the Government and beyond the control of the people for whom the Senator speaks in such eloquent terms.

Mr. CONNALLY. O Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Wyoming what can this board do? It can only do the things that are set forth in the joint resolution after its terrible perpetuity is established.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. As I understand, Mr. Mellon has offered to the Government of the United States a very valuable gift, but has made some provision as to its management in the future. Is the Senate of the United States in any position to attempt to negotiate with the man who owns the property and who can do with it what he pleases? Is not the question that of simply accepting his proposition or rejecting it and saying we will have nothing to do with it?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Kentucky in his statement is eminently correct, as he usually is. Of course, what he says is true. Mr. Mellon says, "I make this tender; do you want it or do you not want it?" I think it ill becomes us to assume a position of bargaining, as if we were trying to buy an old, spavined horse, offering, giving, and taking, and hawking back and forth. If we want this gift on the terms proposed, let us take it; if we do not, let us say, "No, Mr. Mellon; take back your pictures and keep them."

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming, assuming, as we must assume under the terms of the letter from Mr. Mellon, that he will not change his offer, whether or not, right now, the Senator from Wyoming is willing to say that we should reject this gift?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in response to the Senator from Washington, I will say that I am not ready to make that assumption, for, from all the representations which have become available to me, I judge that no effort has been made to determine whether or not Mr. Mellon would agree to a modification.

Let me say further that I note on page 3 this provision:

> A successor shall be chosen by a majority vote of the general trustees and shall have a term expiring 10 years from the date of the expiration—

And so forth. That is a provision for the self-perpetuation of the board by those who are appointed in the first instance with the approval of Mr. Mellon.

I would agree to what the Senator from Texas says, that during the lifetime of the donor he might be entitled to select a majority of the board; I might even be willing to say that the majority should be appointed only with his approval; but what about the successors? May I ask the Senator from Texas if he would object to an amendment, in case favorable action should not be taken upon the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, which would provide that successors shall be appointed by the President?

Mr. CONNALLY. I certainly should object to that. Mr. President, my attitude is that we can take this measure or leave it; it is a matter of personal indifference to me. If the people of the United States, through their Representatives in the Senate, want to accept this gift of $40,000,000, in the form of a great art gallery, so far as I am concerned, they will take it as it is tendered or they will not take it at all. The Government is no pauper. We can build our own gallery of art if necessary. Gentlemen seem to be concerned about an expenditure of $300,000 a year. We can go back into that Treasury where those $300,000 are and appropriate money and buy Mr. Mellon's collection of art. He will be dead, nobody much will want it; perhaps we can then buy it. When we buy it, it will be ours; we can say who will control the board of directors; the Senator from Wyoming can be satisfied and the Senator from Wisconsin can be satisfied—and that is worth something. [Laughter.] Then we can run the gallery as we want to run it. Then when some constituent of ours paints a beautiful picture, when some constituent over in ward 6 paints a fine portrait, perhaps of his Senator, we can have the board of trustees put it in the gallery of art, where it ought to be. That is the kind of art gallery that some Senators seem to want. We will take a referendum on what kind of pictures we are going to exhibit there; we will send out a circular letter to our constituents and ascertain what they think about the kind of pictures we put in there. It will be our gallery; it will be our money; and we will run it as the people want it run. [Laughter.]

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Texas to the fact that the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution is appointed thuswise: Three by the Vice President of the United States, three by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and six by resolution of the Congress. So I think we can be satisfied that, so far as the constitution of the Board of Regents is concerned, the people will always be represented, and that we can afford to trust them to select men to go on the board of trustees of the proposed national gallery who will be satisfactory.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from California. The Senator perhaps knows as much about the workings of this Government, both from the inside and the outside, as does any other Member of the Senate, and I thank him for pointing out very clearly the facts as to the appointment of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. Who is there who can say that the Smithsonian Institution has been prostituted? Who is the man who can say that the administration of the great museum under the Smithsonian Institution has ever been employed in any way, politically or otherwise, to the detriment of the great purposes for which it was established? Who appoints the Smithsonian Institution regents? The Senator from California has pointed out that three are appointed by the Speaker of the House, three by the Vice President, and the remainder, six, are appointed by resolution of the Congress.

What about Howard University, which is a Federal institution, and the Soldiers' Home, and, I understand, many other institutions, which have boards constructed somewhat on the same principle as embodied in this joint resolution?

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. ANDREWS. Are we not violating——

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; we are. I do not know what it is, but we are violating it.

Mr. ANDREWS. Are we not violating the ancient adage, that a donee should not look too long a gift horse in the mouth? I think of recent years, since trucks and tractors have taken the place of the horse that the adage has been modified so that it now provides we should not too long look a gift horse in the mouth unless the giver send the feed bag along. [Laughter.]

This proposition involves also a gift in the form of an endowment of $5,000,000, which will provide nearly $200,000 annually to take care of the gift. I am just wondering why it is that we spend so much time in discussing the acceptance of a gift of $65,000,000.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Florida for bringing forward the old aphorism about "looking a gift horse in the mouth." I know it is rather unfashionable in some quarters to have such antiquities brought forth to our attention, but I think now and then it is quite valuable and quite desirable that we turn our faces back to some of the solemn old injunctions, the solemn old expressions of philosophy, that are good in this day and time as well as when they were first uttered.

Let me say to the Senator from Florida that my attitude, as I stated it a little while ago, is that I have personally no interest in this gallery of art. I have never painted a picture on canvas in my life, and I do not expect ever to get one into this gallery. But as a Senator of the United States, I am thinking about the people who will never be able to buy a picture themselves, who will never be able to paint a picture themselves, and yet who have emotions, who have artistic temperaments, who have sentiments and feelings, just as Mr. Mellon has them, capable of being aroused and stirred by great works of art.

He will not have them long. He is going out on that long journey, that journey which stretches away and touches the land that no man knows; but he is willing to leave to the American people, to your people and my people, to you, Mr. President, and to me, the rich fruits of a lifetime which he has gathered from all points of the artistic world, from the art galleries of Europe, from collectors all over the earth—these great masterpieces which depict things which the written word cannot depict, which can stir emotions that the oratory of even Senators cannot stir. If Mr. Mellon wants to leave these things to his fellow citizens and leave them in trust in the hands of the Government, then he should be permitted to do so.

Where else could he leave them that they would be more sacredly cared for? He could put them in some private foundation and emblazon it all over with his name in gilt, "The Mellon Art Gallery"; but he does not ask that. He does not even ask that his name be associated with this gift. He has merely said, "I want to give it to the American people, and all that I ask is the poor privilege that in the selection of the first five members of the board, not that I shall be permitted to select them, but that I may approve the selections which the Smithsonian Institution shall make"—a poor privilege, Mr. President. Here we have $40,000,000 on the one side and on the other side the poor privilege, not "I shall name them", but, "After the Smithsonian Institution has named them, please let me look at the nominations and see that there is no one there to whom I might object."

That is all! Forty million dollars on the one side and that poor privilege on the other side.

Yet there are Senators who say, "No! We are willing that our people shall not have this great gift. We are willing to close the eyes of our constituents so they may not behold these wonderful works of art. We are willing to close the windows of their souls to those marvelous works of art. We will be darned if we will let old Mellon name or even approve five members of the board, even though he will be here only a little while longer." [Laughter.]

Mr. President, so far as I am personally concerned the Senate can take the joint resolution or leave it. For one, I am going to vote for it just as it is written. The Senate passes measures occasionally just as they are written and without amendment.

What is the objection to this measure? What is wrong with it? We have in the Senate a committee, of which I am the poor and humble chairman. We spent a considerable period of time investigating this matter. We had before us the representatives of Mr. Mellon. We had before us the officials of the Smithsonian Institution. We had before us the officials of the Fine Arts Commission. We had representatives of the Department of Justice. Over a long period of negotiations, if we may call them negotiations—I call them conferences—as a result of a long period of conferences we were all agreed that the joint resolution would accomplish the purposes Mr. Mellon had in view, would protect the interests of the United States, would guarantee that the administration of this great gallery would be in the hands of and under the protection of the Smithsonian Institution, upon whose official garments there has never been a stain of any kind.

What else do Senators want? I do not propose to vote for a board of trustees that has to pass through all the channels of patronage arrangements to become a board of the national gallery of art. I am willing to entrust the selection where the joint resolution proposes it shall be placed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I approach this subject from a disinterested and a fair point of view. That may not be true, but if it is not true I am not conscious of it. I dislike the attitude of the chairman of the committee coming to the Senate and saying, "We have the joint resolution; we have considered it; but the Senate has no right to amend it."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I think the Senator does me an injustice. I said so far as I am personally concerned the Senate may take it or leave it just as it is. Of course, the Senate can amend it or the Senate can throw it in the waste basket if it is the desire to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but it must not be amended. We have notice of that. I should not think Mr. Mellon would object to a reasonable amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Can the Senator speak for him?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I cannot. If I thought I could I would give up that idea now after listening to the Senator from Texas.

I do not think it is any disgrace for a Senator to offer an amendment even though I do not agree with it. If the theory is a correct one that we must take this joint resolution without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t", then why have the Senate? Why not let the committee, when it agrees on a measure, send it to the President for his signature?

I am not questioning the good faith of the those who are supporting the joint resolution and who do not want it amended. That includes the Senator from Texas, that includes the President of the United States, and that includes all the members of the committee. I am not trying to cast any reflection upon any of the members of the committee or upon other individuals, nor even upon Mr. Mellon. Mr. Mellon has the right to say to the Government of the United States, "Here is this collection. I am going to give it to you, but I attach this condition." He can attach any condition he sees fit and refuse to give the collection unless that condition is fully met. But as a free American citizen and as a Member of this legislative body I still claim the right to say, "I will not take it on that condition", and I mean no reflection on him when I say it.

I am not willing that anybody should cast any reflection upon me or upon my motives because I refuse to accept the gift on a given condition.

As I see it the amendment ought to be adopted. Perhaps the board of trustees might be approved first by Mr. Mellon, and I presume he would be consulted in the appointing of the members of the board. If the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. La Follette] should be adopted and if I were President of the United States, I would consult Mr. Mellon, and I would not appoint anybody on the board to whom he objected. But I would not let Mr. Mellon say to me, "You cannot appoint this man, or you cannot appoint that man." No one objects to Mr. Mellon being considered and consulted, and to giving careful consideration to anything he may suggest.

What is the legal effect of the joint resolution without the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin? It provides that the board of trustees must have the approval of Mr. Mellon, and then that they shall be self-perpetuating after that. I do not think that is good legislation. There may be cases where it ought to be done. This may be one of them. If Senators think it is, let them vote against the amendment and for the original joint resolution; but I do not believe this is a case where that ought to be done. I do not think it is disgraceful or dishonest or unreasonable to say, "We will let the President of the United States appoint this board." There are other things in the joint resolution. If they were not there, I might feel somewhat different about this amendment; but I find later on in the joint resolution, on page 5, subsection (b), commencing in line 8, reading as follows:

> In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no work of art shall be—
> When we agree to the committee amendment—
> included in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Art unless they are of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

What does that language mean when it is taken in connection with the fact that the board is to be self-perpetuating after having started out with the donor's approval? I do not suppose many Senators have had the privilege of seeing this collection, and perhaps they would not be judges as to whether the pictures were of high quality or otherwise if they should see it. That statement probably would apply to me. I admit that; but I realize, and it is a historical fact, that pictures condemned by experts have, after the lapse of years, become extremely valuable in the estimation of experts; that pictures which went begging at any price have, as the years went by, sold for enormous prices. So I can see how there might be a disagreement even between experts as to the value of any certain work of art.

This joint resolution provides that no work of art shall be admitted to this art gallery unless it is "of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor." Very easily a board prejudiced in favor of the particular items of art given by the donor might say, with reason and fairness, under that language, that no picture, no specimen of art, shall ever be admitted to the national gallery of art except those originally acquired by the donor.

I do not think that would be a harsh construction if the board believed a given picture was not of the prescribed standard of quality. Perhaps some other expert, equally able to judge art, would think it was of superior quality even to the pictures given by the donor. But if the sole requisite for membership on the board is that the donor shall be satisfied with its members, it will naturally be composed of art experts who think this particular donation is superior to anything else.

I presume experts put on the witness stand now would disagree as to the quality of these works of art. I do not know what their judgment would be. Whom will it hurt if we say that the President of the United States shall appoint the members of the board? In the case of the Smithsonian Institution the donor did not appoint anybody. I could cite a historical instance in answer to the Senator's assertion that no instance could be cited where any abuse was had of anything connected with the Smithsonian Institution. On a former occasion I undertook to demonstrate that a most disgraceful episode had happened under the name of the Smithsonian Institution, but I do not blame the Institution for it. They afterward took action on it. I do not care to go into that matter. I do not condemn the Smithsonian Institution on account of that; but it is a historical fact that one of the greatest trusts and monopolies in existence crept under the shield of the Smithsonian Institution to carry on Nation-wide propaganda.

That may never happen again. It may never happen under this board, no matter whether the amendment is agreed to or not. I simply mention, in passing, the fact that those things may happen and do happen under any board, however well regulated; but the point is that the Smithsonian Institution is not governed by a board set up by the donor, a man who was not even an American citizen.

Why should the donor object if these appointments are made by the President of the United States? I think we ought to amend the joint resolution as the Senator from Wisconsin has suggested in his amendment, and that we ought to strike out of the joint resolution certain language. I have no objection to stating in the joint resolution that the collection of the national gallery of art shall always be maintained at a high standard, but I do not wish to put in it a comparison between this picture and that picture, and say that a certain picture shall not go in the gallery unless it comes up to the standard of a certain other picture, and I do not wish to say in the language we enact here that nothing shall be admitted to the national gallery of art which, in the estimation of the board selected by the donor, shall not be equal to the pictures which the donor has given.

If such amendments are not satisfactory to the donor, I should not criticize him if he should say, "I will not give you the pictures or the works of art on that condition." Very well. There is nothing in this amendment or in the amendment I have suggested which casts any reflection whatever upon the donor. The amendment is offered, I presume, in the best of faith. I do not wish to consider the joint resolution in any other way, but it is not right for a donor to say, "Take the gift as I give it, or let it alone", unless we have the right also to say, "We will let it alone." That is what I should say, and that would not be any reflection on anybody. It would simply be a case where two parties to a proposed agreement do not agree, and where, if we should not accept the gift on those terms, the donor would take his collection elsewhere.

It seems to me the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is a fair one, and that the Congress of the United States cannot afford to accept the gift under any other conditions if we think the amendments to which I have referred are reasonable and fair.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to say just a word in response to the remarks made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

I submit that the remarks made by the Senator from Texas confirm the apprehension I expressed at the outset in arguing for the adoption of the pending amendment; namely, that this gallery is to become a national gallery of art that is to be supported by the taxpayers in perpetuity, but that works of art produced by American artists will have little or no chance of ever becoming a part of this permanent collection.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I did not have the privilege of hearing the Senator's opening remarks. Since I have come to the floor I have been reading the joint resolution, especially in the light of what was said about "looking a gift horse in the mouth." I observe that a great deal is required to be done by the United States Government under the terms of this measure.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. HATCH. It is not simply a case of receiving a gift some one offers us, for the Government is to do a great many things under the terms of the joint resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is correct; and since the Senator did not hear my remarks I will state that I am satisfied that many things were said by the Senator from Texas which might indicate that I had some other motive in offering the amendment than to try to bring about a situation whereby, if we are to have a national gallery of art, known as such and supported by the taxpayers of the United States, it shall not only be used as a means of housing the collection which Mr. Mellon is giving, but it shall also, like the national galleries in other capitals of the world, be used in a way which will encourage American artists, and the development of American art indigenous to the history and to the background of the American people.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator from Wisconsin that if the Senator from Texas said anything to indicate any question as to the motives of the Senator from Wisconsin, he now desires publicly to retract it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I refer, for example, to the remarks made by the Senator to the effect that there are Senators who want to see this gallery turned over to patronage channels, and who hope to see portraits of themselves at some time placed in the gallery. Having been the only Senator who had spoken on the subject, I naturally assumed that the Senator's remarks referred to me.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I said I did not want to turn the gallery over to patronage channels to determine the pictures which should be placed in it. I said that for myself. I made no reference to the Senator from Wisconsin. I will say to the Senator that he need not lay to himself any sweet unction that I meant that he alone among Senators wanted to get his portrait there. Every Senator likes to have his picture printed, if he can get it printed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is remarks of the type of those the Senator made after I had offered what I considered to be arguments in support of my amendment, that lead me to address Senators who have just come into the Chamber and were not here at the time I discussed the amendment in the first place. I wanted to clear up before there was a vote the purpose and intent of the amendment.

I submit that everything the Senator from Texas has said justifies the apprehension which I entertain and which is shared by the representatives of every group of American artists who have communicated with me concerning this matter, whose telegrams and letters I have already placed in the RECORD, namely, that this measure is so drawn that the National Gallery of Art of this country will not be administered in such a way as to be a stimulus to the development of American art which is modern in character and indigenous to the history, the background, and the traditions of the people of the United States.

The Senator has emphasized again and again in his remarks that the condition Mr. Mellon has placed upon his gift in order that his collection may be protected is a proper one, and I wish to say once more, and to emphasize the statement, without criticism of anyone, that it is a matter of common knowledge that the collector has toward art an entirely different attitude than that of the creative artist and those who happen to live at the particular time a work of art is consummated.

All history demonstrates that some of the very pictures which are now to be a part of this collection, if it be given to the people of this country, went begging at the time they were created by the artists who produced them. They had no monetary value, and some of the artists who are represented in this collection starved to death because they could not sell their works of art at the time when they produced them.

Of course, these pictures have great value; they have the value which has accrued as a result of the judgment of generations which have come on since the works of art were created. I have been told also by artists in whose judgment I have confidence that there are many pictures in this collection which have great monetary value simply because they are rare and because the artist did not produce many pictures.

Be that as it may, when this gallery is established as a national gallery, and when it is supported by the taxpayers' money, I am contending that it should be administered in such a way as not only to afford access of the public to the collection of these rare and valuable pictures of the past, but that it should also be administered as a stimulus and as a means of affording encouragement to artists who are producing in their own day and generation works of art reflective of the history, the background, and the traditions of their era.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, it seems to me the trend and direction of the discussion shows a misapprehension of what Mr. Mellon intended in offering this gift to the Nation. As a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I was very much interested at the hearing to learn from Mr. Mellon's representative just what is his purpose.

The telegrams and letters which have been read and some of the remarks which have been made show that his purpose is misunderstood. He does not propose to offer to the Nation a comprehensive collection of art; he does not propose that such a collection shall ever be formed to be placed in this proposed gallery. It is not a collection of fine art generally; it is limited to paintings and to sculpture. It is not a collection of paintings and of sculpture generally; it does not include oriental paintings, which have a place in the Freer Gallery; it does not include examples of many schools of painting which find their place in a comprehensive collection. It does not include even small paintings, such as miniatures, or drawings, which have their place in many museums. It does not include any of the applied arts.

This does not mean that such artistic objects should not be collected. It does not mean that living artists should not be encouraged. That is not the purpose of this collection, however; it is not the basis on which it was formed, and it is not the purpose for which Mr. Mellon is giving it to the Nation.

All other collections have their places. We haye some such collections here in Washington. We have the Corcoran Gallery named after the original donor. We have the Freer Gallery, named after the original donor. Even the Smithsonian Institution is named after the original donor. But the greatest collection of all in the Smithsonian Institution will, under the terms of the pending measure, hereafter be known, as Senators see by reference to the last line on page 6, as the "national collection of fine arts."

Such paintings as have just been described by the Senator from Wisconsin will have their place here in Washington; they will have their place in the Smithsonian Institution, but not in the gallery we are discussing today. They will have their place in the national collection of fine arts.

However, Mr. Mellon has made a very great concession from his original purpose. He is providing for the erection of a great building, far larger than is necessary to house his present collection, which contains, we may say, some 100 masterpieces, and I might add that some of those masterpieces are by American painters. The building will be sufficiently large to hold three times the number in the collection, and at the suggestion of the committee Mr. Mellon, through his representative, agreed that the joint resolution as presented should be amended so that those parts of the gallery not needed at present for the permanent collection, and which perhaps will be available for a generation or more, may be used for the exhibition of other works of art, works of living American artists, for example, which do not come up to the standard set by the permanent collection, but which will serve the purpose of interesting the general public in works of art produced by American artists. The only condition made was that additions to the permanent collection should be of the same high standard as that of the pictures in the present collection.

Of course, any measure or standard for works of art is a flexible one. Mr. Mellon took the standard of the present collection and I think that is as good a standard as he could have taken. He wants to make sure that that standard is maintained. In the past we have seen too many collections of fine works of art, and other collections of first-rate things, collections of books, collections of scientific material, collections of every sort, swamped by additions of works of inferior quality. Mr. Mellon wanted to have a relatively small collection of first-rate quality.

Reference has been made to the fact that great galleries elsewhere contain examples of the work of schools of all ages and of different civilizations, even including present-day art. I think that is generally the case. In London there is a national gallery which has an entirely different scope from the Tate Gallery. In Paris there is the Louvre, entirely different in scope from the Luxembourg. The idea of Mr. Mellon apparently is that a work of art should be tested by time before it is admitted to this particular gallery. It may have a place elsewhere. All the other objects which are worth collecting and are of interest to artists and to the people of America generally, will have their place in the national collection of fine arts.

I think that, whether we like it or not, whether we would form a collection on the same basis on which Mr. Mellon has formed his or not, we ought to consider his primary purpose, which is to have a permanent collection of the greatest works of art in this particular field made available to the people of the United States. He gives practically everything except the cost of making these pictures available for the pleasure of the American people who come to their capital city of Washington.

We may find fault with the designation of this collection as a national gallery of art. I myself think there is chance for confusion between that name and the national collection of fine arts. But between the two they cover the grounds of which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has spoken, and I do not think we ought to cavil over the name chosen for the gallery for this collection or the name chosen for the collection itself, so long as it does not bear the donor's name. I think we ought to take the broad conception of the donor and accept it as one of the greatest gifts ever made to a nation in the department of fine arts.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words in clarification of some of the issues which have been raised by this debate; and, first of all, I shall put into the RECORD this statement as to the Smithsonian Institution:

It is a legal establishment having as its members the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Chief Justice, and the President's Cabinet; but it is governed by a board of regents consisting of the Vice President, the Chief Justice, three Members of the United States Senate, three Members of the House of Representatives, and six citizens of the United States who are appointed by joint resolution of the Congress.

This Board of Regents is constituted of men of such character and standing that no one can question the integrity of the Board or its unselfish devotion to the purposes for which the institution was created. I read in the Congressional Directory that the Smithsonian Institution, one of the greatest of its kind in the world, was established as the gift of an Englishman by the name of Smithson, who many years ago left his fortune to the United States for that purpose.

I call the attention of the Senate to the personnel of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. It consists of the Chief Justice of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, Joseph T. Robinson, M. M. Logan, and Charles L. McNary, as the representatives of the Senate, and T. Alan Goldsborough, Charles L. Gifford, and Clarence Cannon, as Members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CONNALLY. They are selected, I may say to the Senator, by their respective bodies.

Mr. McADOO. They are selected by their respective bodies. I thought I made that clear.

As citizens of the United States who are chosen by joint resolution of Congress, we have the following on the present board: Frederic A. Delano, of Washington, D. C.; John C. Merriam, of Washington, D. C.; R. Walton Moore, of Virginia; Robert W. Bingham, of Kentucky; Augustus P. Loring, of Massachusetts; and Roland S. Morris, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the apprehensions indicated by the debate on the pending measure as to the future conduct of the National Gallery of Art are without adequate foundation. The joint resolution, as drawn, provides that the Board of Trustees shall be composed as follows: The Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution. In addition to that, five general trustees, who shall be citizens of the United States, shall be chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, whose names I have just given to the Senate.

These nine men constitute the Board who are to administer the national gallery of art. The first five members selected by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution are to be subject to the approval of Mr. Mellon, the donor of this generous gift to the people of the United States.

I am frank to say that if any Senator here were giving $45,000,000 to the people of the United States for the establishment of a great art gallery of this kind, he would naturally desire to see that for the purposes of his gift all the details were carried out in conformity with the national interest; and he might at least have the privilege of approving the selection of the five men on the board of trustees of this national gallery of art who are chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. That, as I understand, is all Mr. Mellon wants.

Let us come now to the question of the taxpayers' money, about which I hear so much. This collection cost Mr. Mellon, as I understand, $30,000,000. In addition, he is giving $10,000,000 to erect the building. The National Government furnishes the site, the ground. Mr. Mellon endows the institution with $5,000,000 additional, the income from which is to be employed for certain purposes of the trust, and for the purchase of additional specimens of art which are to be put into the gallery from time to time. That is a total of $45,000,000. At 3 percent the annual contribution by the donor is $1,350,000. I understand that the total cost to the Government for maintaining the building and conducting its general operations will be $300,000 a year. That is all it is going to cost the Government of the United States except what might properly be considered as interest on the value of the land donated by the Government. But even then the donor of this gift is certainly furnishing to the people of the United States a magnificent collection of art and a magnificent building to house it, which will be of enduring benefit, advantage, and pleasure to all the people of the United States.

Much has been said here to the effect that no American artist will be able to get his pictures into this gallery. A national art gallery certainly ought to have some standards of art by which the exhibits which are proposed to be put into it from time to time may be judged. The joint resolution wisely and properly provides that:

> In order that the collection of the national gallery of art shall always be maintained at a high standard, and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no work of art shall be included in the permanent collection of the national gallery of art unless they are of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

How is any addition to the gallery to be judged or determined? How is the selection to be made? It is specifically provided in the joint resolution that the Board, constituted as I have heretofore described:

> Shall have all the usual powers and obligations of a trustee in respect of all trust funds administered by it and all works of art acquired by it.

It is necessary to have some authority in charge of this institution to conduct its operations, and that authority must of necessity have the power to determine what works of art shall be admitted to the gallery.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], it is simply to have the President appoint five members of the board instead of their being selected on the recommendation of Mr. Mellon and appointed by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution. That is correct; it is not?

Mr. McADOO. I understand that the reverse is correct. The Board of Regents of the Smithsonian selects the first five trustees, subject to Mr. Mellon's approval.

Mr. McKELLAR. What possible objection could there be to the plan of having the President of the United States make these appointments?

Mr. McADOO. My objection is simply this: We are establishing a permanent trust just like the Smithsonian Institution. The President of the United States does not select the trustees of the Smithsonian Institution. Why should the President, being changed, as he may be, every 4 years, be given the authority or charged with the responsibility of selecting these five trustees?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to follow the question which the Senator has just answered. If he wishes to follow the practice of the Smithsonian Institution, why does he not do so? In the case of the Smithsonian Institution the donor has nothing to say about the appointment of the trustees. The objection here is that the donor does have. When the Senator classifies the two cases as being the same, I point out to him that they are absolutely different. If we do not wish the President to appoint the trustees, let the Smithsonian trustees appoint them. The objectionable feature is that they must have the approval of the donor, and are then self-perpetuating.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, the donor in this case approves five of the first board of trustees; that is all. Mr. Mellon is not going to live forever, any more than Mr. Smithson could live forever. Smithson has had no influence with the trustees of the Smithsonian since he endowed that Institution.

Mr. NORRIS. Smithson had nothing to do with it in the first instance.

Mr. McADOO. I do not know. He may have had. I have no objection to Mr. Mellon's having influence with the first five trustees of the national gallery of art which is created with his $45,000,000 donation any more than I would have objected to Smithson's having influence with the first board of trustees of the great institution he founded. If he had such influence, it certainly has not impaired the usefulness of the Smithsonian Institution, and it has not operated to the injury of the American people. If Mr. Mellon, making this great gift to the American people, should be permitted to express his approval of the first five trustees selected by the Smithsonian Institution before they are inducted into the office of trustees, I do not think it will mean that Mr. Mellon's influence will permanently affect the constitution of the board of trustees in the future.

Mr. McKELLAR. Without regard to Mr. Mellon's influence one way or the other—and I think he should be consulted so far as the first board is concerned, and I presume, as a matter of fact, any appointing power would consult him—the joint resolution provides that after the board is once established it shall be self-perpetuating.

Inasmuch as the Government is going to furnish the principal amount of money to keep this art gallery in operation for all time to come, it seems to me that the President of the United States or someone else, such as the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, should be given authority to select the trustees in the same manner as the regents of the Smithsonian Institution are appointed. It seems to me it ought finally to be a governmental institution, and ought not to be left to the control of a self-perpetuating board.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, my answer to that suggestion is that by the very terms of the pending measure the board of trustees is to consist of the Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary of State, and the Secretary of the Treasury, three of the highest public officials in our Government, who will always be the voice of the Government, so to speak, on the board. Can we not trust them?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; there is no trouble about that, but they will be in the painful minority; and we have had some experience during the last few months with minorities.

Mr. McADOO. Suppose they are in the minority, the board has no political function; it has nothing to do with the administration of public affairs. The powers of the board of trustees are limited solely to the conduct of the art gallery. The members of the board are necessarily vested with the discretion to pass upon objects of art that may be presented from time to time for inclusion in the particular collection. That is the chief function.

The terms of the pending resolution admirably safeguard the purposes in view. They give a stability of organization to the institution that is absolutely vital to its success. How can the public interest, by any conceivable means, be affected by the constitution of the board of trustees as proposed and by putting in the power of the board the necessary discretion to determine what objects of art shall be exhibited in the gallery?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator if it is not true that after this joint resolution shall have become a law, if it shall, and after the first board shall have been appointed, Mr. Mellon will thereafter have nothing whatever to do with the trust?

Mr. McADOO. I was trying to make that point clear; the Senator is absolutely correct. After Mr. Mellon expresses his approval of the first five men chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution he is functus officio; he has nothing more to do with it or with the selection of anybody in the future who may go upon the board of trustees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator will concede, will he not, that the five general trustees, exclusively, select their own successors, and that the ex-officio Members he has mentioned do not participate in the selection of the successors to the general trustees.

Mr. McADOO. I do not so understand the joint resolution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I call the Senator's attention to the provision on page 3, which reads:

> A successor shall be chosen by a majority vote of the general trustees.

Mr. McADOO. Well, the whole board are general trustees.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; the Senator is clearly mistaken about that.

Mr. McADOO. Very well; I do not think it is important, so far as my view of it is concerned. I stand corrected if I am mistaken; but that, I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin, does not affect my view about it anyway, because the members of the board of trustees would have nothing to gain by an improper administration of the trust and I can conceive nothing they could do except to pass upon objects of art which might be exhibited from time to time in the art gallery.

I am sure it is not the intention to determine, and I am also sure that no board of trustees would ever determine, the value of any art exhibit in this great institution by reference wholly to standards of hundreds of years ago. There is a standard for works of art; but modern art cannot be compared with ancient art, except relatively. The discretion must be lodged in somebody to perform that duty, and it is very properly lodged in the board of trustees.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we are making a mountain out of a molehill. I think that the board is admirably constituted as proposed by the joint resolution. It will give a continuity and permanency to the administration of the gallery so far as the board of trustees is concerned. That is absolutely necessary. Sometimes we appoint corporate organizations as trustees in these matters. Why? Because they exist perpetually, or at least for long terms of years. We employ such trustees in wills and in various kinds of trust relationships; but in this instance we put the control in men of character, who, of course, will administer the trust with propriety. They will not have the power to appoint even a janitor in the building or have anything to do with the administration of the building itself; and quite properly so.

Mr. President, when a citizen of the United States, whoever he may be, has the generosity and the patriotism to offer the people of the United States a great gift of this character, a gift which will belong to the people of the United States, over which he will have no control and in conjunction with which he will be able to exercise no influence upon future appointments of trustees, as they may be made from time to time—when he offers a gift of such imposing character, we should not split hairs with him about it. For my part I am grateful to Mr. Mellon for offering this magnificent gift to the people of the United States, and I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept it upon the terms outlined in the joint resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me in his time?

Mr. McADOO. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. During the course of a colloquy between the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and myself on the subject of the conditions under which the gift is offered, it was stated by the Senator from Wisconsin substantially that no negotiations had been conducted with a view to arranging other terms than those embraced within the joint resolution. I said then that it was my information that the Attorney General, representatives of the Smithsonian Institution, and others have participated in discussions with the attorney and agents for Mr. Mellon, and that the conditions set forth in the joint resolution are the conditions which Mr. Mellon insists upon. Since making that statement I have confirmed its accuracy by talking with the Attorney General himself. He said that the matter was under consideration for some hours and that proposals were made looking toward a change in certain of the conditions, including those which relate to the selection of the trustees or directors, and that the agreement entered into and incorporated in the joint resolution represents the conclusion that was reached after the discussion of the matter. Therefore, I reaffirm the statement which I made.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the information he has given. My information was that there had been no negotiations over the question whether or not Mr. Mellon would be willing to have the trustees named by the President of the United States. I wish to stand corrected if I was incorrect.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long. I desire to confirm, as I stated while the Senator from Arkansas was out of the Chamber, the statement he makes in regard to negotiations. Representatives of Mr. Mellon and representatives of the Attorney General were before the committee, and it was made clear that the joint resolution was the result of their long conference and collaboration and that it represented the final conclusions and decisions with regard to the matter.

Mr. President, Senators have injected into the debate the subject of the responsibilities and the burdens which the joint resolution places upon the Government, and, based on that, they have made their contention as to the method of control.

What are the burdens which this measure puts on the Government? Mr. Mellon makes a gift of $30,000,000 worth of pictures, $10,000,000 for a building in which to house them, and $5,000,000 for an endowment. What are his conditions? All the conditions he makes are that the Government shall take care of the pictures and shall make them available to the people of the United States. That is all. He gets nothing. The only responsibility the Government assumes is that it will not allow sabotage; that it will provide guards so that the great masterpieces may not be mutilated and destroyed. The Government is to provide facilities whereby the collection may be opened up to the public, so that every citizen of the United States may have an opportunity to see it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. In addition to what the Senator has said, it is also true that from the endowment provided by Mr. Mellon, the salaries of the director, of the assistant, of the secretary, and of the curator are to be paid.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly. From the funds accumulated from the endowment such charges are to be paid; the Senator from Arkansas is eminently correct. The only responsibility the Government assumes is that it will not let these great pictures be exposed to the elements and to destroying agents; that it will care for them; that it will house them; and that it will make them available to the people of the United States. That is all the burden the Government assumes. Of course, it will pay a little money; it will have to pay for guards; it will have to pay for the charwomen; it will have to pay the employees who care for the pictures and who make them available to the people. Guides will be needed to explain them, and the Government will provide for them. That is the only burden which the Government of the United States assumes in accepting this gift.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN], who is not only an able and distinguished Senator but a great art collector, for the contribution he has made to the debate. I am glad to have him as a member of the committee to urge upon the Senate the acceptance of the joint resolution.

It has been said here that the proposed art gallery, because of the requirement as to the standard of pictures, will exclude modern artists and those who are undertaking to achieve advancement in their profession. Mr. President, there is already another art gallery in the Smithsonian Institution which is available to exhibitors of that kind. The last line on page 6 of the joint resolution refers to the National Collection of Fine Arts. Modern painters, new painters, and others may exhibit their works there, and if they obtain sufficiently high rank, their works can be admitted to the particular collection of the national gallery of art.

As has already been suggested, here in the city of Washington are located the Freer Gallery of Art and the Corcoran Gallery of Art in which facilities are available to exhibitors.

Mr. President, let me say with regard to other great art galleries of the world, that because of its experience the Louvre in Paris had to establish a high standard, and therefore it established the Luxembourg, which is a sort of training school for the Louvre. In the Luxembourg current artists and others may exhibit their works, and if they finally receive the approval of artists and those who are qualified to judge, then they may be accepted in the Louvre. It was the experience of the Louvre over a period of half a century that many works of art were accepted which were later found to be unworthy and not of a standard in keeping with that great gallery of art.

The same thing is true of the London Art Gallery. They have a secondary gallery known as the Tate Gallery, where contemporary artists try out their works.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has pending a joint resolution, Senate Joint Resolution 99, to provide an additional appropriation for the kind of a gallery which Senators have been discussing, where untried contemporary artists may exhibit their works. If established, it would be a sort of training school for this great gallery of art.

There is no disposition on the part of the sponsors of the joint resolution nor on the part of Mr. Mellon, if I understand his representatives, to deny opportunity to other artists, but it is his interest and desire to maintain the high character of the particular gallery which he is donating and which he proposes to house in a $10,000,000 structure, and so it is provided that other paintings may be exhibited in another gallery of art which is already in existence and under the control of the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. President, the joint resolution has been approved not alone by the Department of Justice in collaboration with the representatives of Mr. Mellon, but it is approved by the President of the United States who, in a letter to the Congress, asked the acceptance of the gift. Let me say to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] that the President of the United States expressed no desire to appoint the members of the board of trustees. He asked the Congress to enact legislation accepting the gift on the terms imposed by Mr. Mellon. The measure has been approved by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate and by the Library Committee of the House of Representatives. It has already passed the House. It is approved by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution as to its form, its provisions, and its administrative processes. Our committee had before it representatives of the Smithsonian Institution. The joint resolution is approved by Mr. Delano, Chairman of the National Parks and Planning Commission, and also by the Commission of Fine Arts through Dr. Moore, its president, and it has also been approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, the only substantial objection is that Mr. Mellon asks permission to approve the appointments made by the Board of the Smithsonian Institution of the first five general trustees. As suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO], after Mr. Mellon approves—not appoints, but approves—the first five general trustees selected by the Board of the Smithsonian Institution, his connection with regard to this foundation ceases. It will be just as though his brain and his hand were henceforth paralyzed. He will have no control, no influence, no power whatever over the national gallery of art or the works which it shall contain.

To say the gallery and its contents will not be under the control of the Government is ridiculous. Who are the trustees of the Smithsonian Institution? Among them are some of the highest functionaries and dignitaries of the Government, responsible to the Senate and responsible to the House of Representatives, to wit, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and others.

I am glad the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] spoke in connection with the matter because he has served as a member of the Board of the Smithsonian Institution and consequently knows the high character of the Institution. He knows how completely it is divorced from politics and political influence. He knows it is a great altruistic foundation such as will be the national gallery of art which we are now discussing, not established to get votes, but for the delectation, the edification, the education, the spiritual inspiration of the people of the United States.

It is said that contemporary artists cannot derive any advantage from the establishment of this gallery. Any struggling artist ought to be benefited by having available this great gallery containing the masterpieces of artists of the past, such as Rubens, Rembrandt, Leonardo da Vinci, and many other great painters, whose works will be here exhibited. If a struggling artist can gain no inspiration from the vision of these great masters of the past, I am afraid he would never get any inspiration anywhere.

I can see no reason why the Government of the United States should turn back this gift to Mr. Mellon and say, "No, we do not want it unless you let us say how the first board of trustees shall be appointed. If you do not want to do that you can take your pictures, your statuary, your art collection, and we will not let the people of the United States have access to them."

Mr. President, the chances are that if the United States of America ever gets a great art gallery it will have to be given to it by someone. Suppose we should have submitted to us today a bill to appropriate $30,000,000 to buy pictures such as Mr. Mellon is proposing to present to the United States as a gift? Out on the stump we would hear candidates against every man who voted for such a bill, saying, "He voted to take the taxpayers' money. He took your money. He taxed your gasoline a cent a gallon, and what did he do with it? He voted to buy a picture painted by an old fellow called Leonardo da Vinci. When did he live? He lived a thousand years ago. What do we care today about Leonardo da Vinci?"

If we are ever to have a national gallery of art, we are going to have to get it as a gift. Now that we have an opportunity to get it as a gift, let us accept it!

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, because I assume there will not be a record vote on the pending joint resolution and because I desire to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and to vote against the measure itself if his amendment is not adopted, I wish to state briefly my reasons for my position.

In the first place, I fully agree with the argument made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] in connection with maintaining a high standard for the art gallery. I have no objection whatever to the joint resolution on that ground. I believe his position is absolutely sound and that, either with this or any other art gallery, every necessary precaution should be adopted in order to provide a high standard for the contents of the gallery.

I am not greatly disturbed with reference to the appointment of the first members of the board. Under the provisions of the joint resolution, as I understand—and if I am wrong I should like to be corrected—I believe the action of the Senate would come within those decisions of the Supreme Court of the land which would prevent any future Congress from changing the terms of the law if it should see fit to attempt to do so. In other words, when we legislate to accept this gift, if I am correct in my interpretation of the pending measure and the law, we will then, so long as we have a Government, so long as we have this gallery, have a self-perpetuating board. We will have a board which cannot be removed by the Congress. We will have a board which cannot be removed by the House, the Senate, and the President of the United States. We will have a board which could not even be removed if we should submit an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and it should be unanimously approved by the 48 States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has stated a proposition which, during this debate, has concerned me more than all others combined. I desire to ask him if he thinks, if this joint resolution should be passed, and the Congress should see fit in the future to modify the joint resolution with reference to the board, that it would not have the constitutional power to do so. Although it might, of course, be a manifestation of bad faith, would we not have the power to do so?

Mr. BLACK. If the decision in the Dartmouth College case and the principles on which that decision was based are sound law, it is my judgment that if we accept this gift we shall thereby make a contract to comply with the provisions of the measure. I do not believe we should have the power, for instance, in the next Congress, or 10 years or 50 years from now, to change the provisions of the measure, and subject the control of this gallery to any board except that which by that time would have perpetuated itself for a period of 50 years. It would be a self-perpetuating board which would not be under the control of the Senate or the Government. It is true that it would not be under the control of Mr. Mellon. It would not be under the control of any agency except itself. Five members of the board, filled in from time to time by the surviving members of the board, would permanently, constantly, and perpetually determine, without any control by the United States Government, the policies of this particular gallery.

Agreeing fully that Mr. Mellon would not have control, it seems to me no one can dispute the fact that the control would be in this board. Suppose it be true that we would not be bound by our contract made in accepting this gift: If we concede that, we still would have enacted a law and accepted a gift upon express terms and stipulations, after having been warned by the chairman of the committee who has diligently pursued his study of this measure that to adopt any other course of control would not be satisfactory to the donor. What does that mean? It means that Mr. Mellon is making a conditional gift to the Government—because I construe anything to be conditional which retains, directly or indirectly, any part of the control of the property, and deprives the donee of the control of that property—and we should have an agreement with him, made in solemn session after having been warned that he demands this agreement, that we must have a self-perpetuating board to keep control of the gift.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In order to ascertain just what would be the powers of this board, suppose after we make this contract, if we accept this gift, that the board should determine, say 25 or 50 years from now, that they would exhibit these pictures only once a month. I do not suppose they would ever do it, but suppose they did: Would there be any control on the part of the Government to prevent that being done?

Mr. BLACK. As I read the joint resolution, the board would have that control.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think so.

Mr. BLACK. So, Mr. President, it is my belief that when the Government accepts a gift, whatever may be its value, the Government should accept the responsibility for controlling the property which is bestowed for the use of the people.

I fully agree with the statement made by the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] as to the Board which controls the Smithsonian Institution. That Board, however, is appointed by public agencies. It is not, as I understand, self-perpetuating. It does not have a life which is as long as the life of the Government itself; but the board referred to in this joint resolution is a permanently self-perpetuating institution. There may be an honest difference of opinion, there may be ample argument on each side, as to the advisability of permitting the Government to control its own gallery.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I suggest to the Senator that even though the Senator's argument be sound it does not meet the situation at which he is aiming, because the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin is directed only at the initial appointment of the board; and if the President should appoint the five members in the beginning, it would still be self-perpetuating.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offered that amendment first because I realized that except by unanimous consent I could not have a vote at one time upon a series of amendments. Naturally, if the amendment should prevail, it would be necessary to amend the provision with regard to the selection of successors on lines 1 and 2 of page 3. I was forced, in pursuance of orderly parliamentary procedure, to offer one amendment at a time.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I do not make complaint that Mr. Mellon, who is proposing to bestow this magnificent collection of paintings upon the people of the United States as a gift, has adopted this particular method for future control. It is, however, contrary to my conception of the control of what the Government owns. I do not distrust popular control. I favor popular control rather than control by self-perpetuating boards. Those who believe in a philosophy of antagonism and hostility to the control by the Government itself of anything the Government owns, except as hedged in and protected by a self-perpetuating board, naturally would not agree with the philosophy of control which I have set out.

In view, however, of the fact that I did not know whether or not there would be a record vote, I wished my position to be clear in the RECORD, that I shall not only vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, and the future amendment which he will offer, if he does, with reference to the self-perpetuating board, but I shall neither now nor hereafter—unless conditions should change in a way that I cannot now anticipate—vote for the creation of a self-perpetuating board over and above the control by the Congress and the duly appointed authorities of the United States with reference to this or any other gift.

I should no more favor control of a gift by Mr. Mellon by such a board than I should favor creating such a board to control a national art gallery which was purchased with the money of the taxpayers themselves. It seems to me the same principle should apply if we are to have an art gallery. A complete gift, as I construe it, means bestowing something upon an individual or a government—if it be a government—with the authority on the part of that individual or government thereafter to control its use. The Government does not have the right hereafter to control the use of this art gallery, unless we construe that right from the fact that a board which may perpetuate itself over a long period of years, not amenable to any governmental control, does give control to the Government of the United States. I do not believe the Government would have control as this joint resolution is drawn.

Therefore, answering a question that was asked by another Senator, I shall unhesitatingly vote against accepting such a conditional gift from anyone where the people, through their representatives, are deprived of controlling a board when it acts contrary to what the people of that generation might believe to be in the public interest.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator has just said that he did not believe the Government would ever have control. I call his attention to the language which appears on pages 2 and 3. That language makes it quite apparent that the Government could not possibly control.

There are to be four ex-officio members of the board of trustees—the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution—but no one of these is given any voice whatever in the selection of the five general trustees. The five general trustees will have complete power in the future to fill all vacancies. For example, I may point out to the Senator that if among the five general trustees there should at one time occur four vacancies, the one survivor would appoint the four successors.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. President, in closing I wish to say that I do not conceive it to be necessary for us to reach the conclusion that if we should accept the gift upon terms which gave the Government control, that would necessarily mean that the gallery had to be controlled by patronage, or on a political basis.

It would be most unfortunate, in my judgment, to have an art gallery so controlled. It is my belief that it would be unfortunate not only in that regard, but in reference to various other governmental activities.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I invite the Senator's attention to section 5, on page 5, as to the powers of the board. A great deal has been said about the power of the board and the power of the Government over this gift. What can the board do? All in the world it is authorized to do is to make by-laws and regulations for the administration of its functions "relating to the acquisition, exhibition, and loan of works of art," and "the administration of its trust funds."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. And any trustee can be compelled by proceedings in the courts to execute his trust in conformity with the trust deed.

Mr. CONNALLY. To be sure; and the board cannot dissipate the art gallery, it cannot give it away. All in the world the joint resolution authorizes the board to do is to adopt by-laws and rules and regulations with regard to the $5,000,000 trust fund, and the exhibition, acquisition, and loan of works of art. That is all the power this terrible monster, this self-perpetrating board, would have.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, on page 4 it is provided that—

> The board is authorized to accept for the Smithsonian Institution and to hold and administer gifts, bequests——

And so forth.

> The income as and when collected shall be placed in such depositories as the board shall determine.

That is one power. Then the joint resolution provides—

> (c) The board shall appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a director, an assistant director, a secretary—

And so forth. Then it provides what they can do.

On page 6 it is provided that—

> The board shall have all the usual powers and obligations of a trustee in respect of all trust funds administered by it and all works of art acquired by it.

In other words, the control will be under this board. It is for that reason Mr. Mellon wanted the board appointed in this manner, I assume.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Let me also call the attention of the Senator to the particular sentence to which the Senator from Texas alluded, on page 5, in section 5 (a), as to the rules and regulations to which the Senator from Texas referred. I read this language:

> The board is authorized to adopt an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed, and to make such bylaws, rules, and regulations as it deems necessary for the administration of its functions under this act, including among other matters bylaws, rules, and regulations relating to the acquisition, exhibition, and loan of works of art.

So that the power to make rules and regulations is not at all confined, as the Senator from Texas would have had us believe, to the acquisition of works of art.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, as I see it, this board will have the usual, complete power possessed by boards which are charged with the performance of such responsibilities.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Texas directed an inquiry to the Senator from Alabama regarding the power of the board. The Senator from Alabama in enumerating some of the powers did not read subsection (b) of section 5, which appears on page 5, and I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama a question in relation to that subsection. It reads:

> (b) In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no work of art shall be included in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Art unless they are of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

Now I desire to ask my question. Is it not clear that under that language the board would have the power to exclude from the gallery all works of art not included in the collection acquired from the donor?

Mr. BLACK. I would so understand it, if the board should believe that any other works of art were not in keeping with the standards of those given by the donor. In other words, as I understand the joint resolution the board would be given complete, unrestricted, untrammelled, unfettered, uncontrolled power over the national gallery of art. I make no complaint that such power would be given to the board. I believe that a board should have the power to take care of the gifts and to handle the fiscal affairs, to appoint the agents, to see that the additional works of art are of high standard.

So far as I am concerned, there is only one issue connected with the measure before us, and it is a simple issue. Under the joint resolution the control would be given, not to regularly appointed agents of the United States Government, under a power of appointment from generation to generation, but the control would be given wholly and alone to the self-perpetuating successors of a board to be appointed immediately after the enactment of the measure.

I do not approve of such control, and therefore I cannot vote for the conditional gift. It is my belief that whatever the Government owns the Government can control. If the Government is incapable of control, in my judgment the Goverment should not own. Exactly the same principle is involved in matters I have discussed a number of times on this floor in connection with the Government supplying huge sums of capital to certain types of business, with the idea that after the Government had supplied the money someone else could for private profit, out of the Government funds, operate the business better than the Government itself could operate it.

I do not believe that we should accept a gift with the knowledge in advance that unless we would break faith, or succeeding Congresses would break faith, 50 years from now or 100 years from now no agency of the Government would have either the legal power, or, if it had the legal power, could in good faith name the agencies which are to control the gift. That is the objection I have to the joint resolution.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. Under the Senator's conception of the measure now pending, if, based on experience, the Congress should decide 4 or 5 years from now that they desired to create a different board from the one now provided for to control the art exhibit and the art gallery, does the Senator think it would be impossible for the Congress to do that and not at the same time create a forfeiture of the gift?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I may reply to the Senator by stating that however we may agree or disagree with the decisions of the Supreme Court with reference to the power of Congress to affect existing contracts, there is nothing clearer from its decisions than that when the Congress makes a contract it must abide by that contract. That was held in the Dartmouth College case, though perhaps that was not the first case. Unfortunately it was so held in a case from Georgia, where a great deal of land had been practically given away by reason of corruption on the part of the legislature. The Supreme Court held that it was impossible for the Legislature of the State of Georgia to repeal that law because such action would violate a provision of the Constitution of the United States.

If we accept Mr. Mellon's conditional gift, which is tendered upon the terms mentioned, it is my belief that our acceptance would constitute a contract, under the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. If it would not be a contract under those decisions, I am very frank to say that, in my judgment, it would certainly not be dealing in good faith with Mr. Mellon to accept his gift now upon the terms stated, when we are told by the chairman of the committee having charge of the pending measure that negotiations have been conducted with Mr. Mellon and that he objects to giving the Government the complete control, for which I contend at this time.

It is my belief that it would be a breach of faith for Congress 5 years from now to change the law under which it had accepted the gift. I believe that for both reasons probably the law would not be changed. I admit that under the general rules relating to trustees, guardians, and so forth, certain conditions might arise that would give the Government the right to go into the courts; but that would require a breach of faith on the part of the trustees.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I concur in all the Senator from Alabama says respecting the moral obligation upon the Congress to carry out its contract. The obligation rests not only on the Congress but upon every other party to a contract; but of course the Senator understands that the Dartmouth College case and the doctrine of that case do not relate to a national law. The inhibition in the Constitution against impairing the obligation of a contract is against the States, and not against the National Government.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator will recall, however, that about 2 years ago Congress attempted to and did pass a law which the Supreme Court believed to be a breach of its contract with the veterans. We had issued certain policies of insurance to the veterans upon certain terms. The veterans had paid for them. The Supreme Court of the United States, as I recall, by unanimous vote struck down that law.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. Of course, there are other provisions of the Constitution than that relating to the impairment of the obligation of contracts which are applicable in such cases as the Senator cites. No citizen can be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law; and there can be no taking of private property for public use without just compensation. But the inhibition to which the Senator was referring, of course, is against the State authority; namely, the prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts.

Mr. BLACK. That was true in the Dartmouth College case and in the case with reference to the land in the State of Georgia. As I have stated, however, from whichever horn of the dilemma the question is viewed, I fully agree with the Senator from Arkansas that it would be a breach of moral obligation for the Congress to accept this gift at this time on these terms, and then, 5 years from now, perhaps when Mr. Mellon is no longer here, 10, 15, or 25 years from now, say, "We will change the terms under which we accepted the gift." It seems to me that we would certainly be making an implied agreement with him at this time to carry on this gallery in this manner.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I am interested in this measure, and especially in the discussion which has taken place as to the possibility of discrimination against American artists. It happens that several noted artists live in my State—artists who, I may say, are world-famous. There are other artists living there who are less famous. Suppose it should happen that those artists and other American artists should be discriminated against by the board set up under the terms of the joint resolution; would there be any way to correct that discrimination?

Mr. BLACK. It is my judgment that the discretion of the trustees would be final, and that only in such cases as the courts recognize as a gross abuse of discretion—the Senator is familiar with the legal term—which sometimes reaches to the point of practical corruption, or capricious and arbitrary action, would the courts intervene.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. But that would be true without regard to who constitute the board of trustees.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is absolutely correct. It would be true with reference to the other members, and I think it should be true.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I agree.

Mr. HATCH. In the opinion of the Senator, would the amendment suggested, and the others to follow hereafter, correct that situation?

Mr. BLACK. In my judgment, it would not change the authority; and I personally should not vote for an amendment which would take away from some board the power to protect the collection of pictures and collection of art from the inclusion of an inferior class of art. It is my belief, however, that trustees appointed under a system such as we now have with reference to the Smithsonian Institution, where the trustees are responsible in a way to the public, being appointed by public agents, would come nearer to administering the gallery in a fair and impartial and judicious manner than would a self-perpetuating board. I think there would be the same difference in that case as, for instance, there would be between the man who has a place for life, who has no responsibility to anyone during his lifetime, and a man who does not have his place for life.

I think to that extent the public would be better protected by a different type of board. I do not like self-perpetuating boards. It is my belief that they are undemocratic, that they are contrary to the genius and the philosophy of our Government. Why should we adopt a provision which places us on record as believing we can better trust a self-perpetuating board? No one votes on the election of an additional member except one of the five members originally selected, or those who become their successors.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator that this is not a case of our preferring the system of selecting the board provided for in the joint resolution. It is a case where the donor has attached a condition to the gift, and our option is either to accept or to reject the gift. It is not to tell him that he cannot make the offer on the condition that he specifies, or that we will fix conditions that suit us in every respect. Our alternative is to reject the gift if we do not like the system.

Mr. BLACK. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Arkansas. It is for that reason that in the beginning of what I have stated I said that so far as I was concerned I should vote against accepting such a conditional gift. I am not willing to vote to accept a conditional gift upon conditions which I believe are unsound and undemocratic. If Mr. Mellon desires to perpetuate his art gallery in his way by private control rather than by governmental control, he, of course, has the option of doing so.

I am not complaining, I may state to my friend the Senator from Texas of the expense of maintaining the art gallery. I believe every dime of the money will be well spent. I am not complaining of the effort to protect the gallery from an inferior class of art. I think it is vital that the bill contain provisions which will protect the art gallery so that a high standard of art shall be always maintained.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, does not the Senator think a donor has the right to state the conditions of his gift?

Mr. BLACK. I think the donor undoubtedly has the right to state the conditions of his gift, and I think the proposed donee has the right to decline to accept the gift with those conditions if the donee believes they are wrong and unsound. Believing they are wrong and unsound, and that they propose an undemocratic method for controlling something which is supposed to be given to the people for their use, I am opposed to accepting a gift upon such conditions.

I make no complaint that the donor has attached these conditions. That is not only his right but his unquestioned privilege. If he believed he could not trust the proper agencies of the Government to control this art gallery for the benefit of the people, I think that he should hedge the gift around with such provisions as he sees fit to ask to have adopted. But believing as I do that if the Government is the proper donee upon whom the legal title should be bestowed, the Government should also have the right of controlling its use, and believing that the control of the use should follow the control of the actual title, I am not in favor of accepting what is supposed to be a gift to the Government, when at the same time the Government and Government agencies are stripped of the power of controlling its use for the benefit of the people. Believing that, I am opposed to the joint resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has been discussing a feature of the joint resolution which seems to me of some importance from a legal standpoint. So far as I am concerned, I should have no objection whatever to Mr. Mellon's approving the board in the first instance, but that approval establishes a board which, according to lines 1 and 2, on page 3, is self-perpetuating. The provision reads:

> A successor shall be chosen by a majority vote of the general trustees and shall have a term expiring 10 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was chosen—

And so forth. I am wondering if Mr. Mellon would object to the Congress of the United States reserving, in its wisdom, the right to amend this proposed act in the future?

Of course, we are confronted by the proposition that Mr. Mellon has a right to tender his gift upon such terms and conditions as he sees fit. Here is a munificent gift; it will convey to the United States an art gallery second to none, I am told, in the world. It will be there for the use of the American people, free of charge, for all time to come. The amount of pleasure and satisfaction which shall be derived from it in the future by thousands and millions no language can adequately express. But it is unfortunate, Mr. President, that we have to accept this gift on the condition that the board of trustees shall be a self-perpetuating body, and it seems to me that the joint resolution, if enacted, would place it beyond our power to amend it, except certainly by the most violent breach of good faith, and probably question as to legality.

My first view was that perhaps the joint resolution came under the decision in what is known as the Charles River Bridge case, which is supposed to have modified the views expressed by the Supreme Court in the Dartmouth College case; but there the court based its opinion entirely upon the proposition that the contractual relation arose out of the implied terms of the charter, which does not obtain in this case, because here the language is affirmative and positive:

> A successor shall be chosen by a majority vote of the general trustees.

Consequently, we could not at any time in the future amend that provision without being guilty of a breach of good faith. I do not know, indeed, whether we could amend it at all; I am not sure about that as a legal proposition; but perhaps, in view of the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas as to the legal aspects, we could do so. I am not prepared to dispute it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in order to make my position clear on this phase of the matter, if I have not already done so——

Mr. BORAH. I understood the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think Congress can repeal at any time any legislation it has enacted. Always where contractual obligations have arisen questions of good faith in the repeal or modification of a statute may arise, and I have said during the remarks of the Senator from Alabama that I do not think it would be an act of good faith to change any material condition attached to the gift after the acceptance of the gift.

Mr. BORAH. I so understood the Senator, and I am not in controversy with him about it. I think it would be a breach of good faith, and probably as a legal proposition we would have the power to do it; but, nevertheless, another question arises. Suppose we should change this condition, suppose we should take away the power of the trustees to perpetuate themselves, then what would become of the gift? Where would it be and to whom would it belong? If it is a contract, and the contract is breached or broken or violated, it is a question whether or not the gift would any longer be the property of the United States or in the possession of the United States.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I suggest to the Senator that this gift, under the terms of the joint resolution, really is to the Smithsonian Institution instead of directly to the Government

Mr. BORAH. That is true, yes; although the Smithsonian Institution is supposed really to represent in this instance the Government.

Mr. CONNALLY. When the gift becomes the property of the Smithsonian Institution, the Senator recognizes the theory of law that where the original purpose cannot be carried out exactly the doctrine of cy pres, as I believe it is called, applies. The condition may be modified from time to time to carry out the original purpose.

Mr. BORAH. Yes, I recognize that rule, but it is of very rare application.

Mr. CONNALLY. This is a rare case.

Mr. BORAH. I concede that it is a rare case, because I do not want to see the Government lose this gift. It seems to me, however, that there should not be any objection upon the part of Mr. Mellon to our reserving the right to do that which we may do, although it would be a breach of good faith to do it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the difficulty about that is that there is objection on the part of Mr. Mellon.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that there is objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. While I have never discussed the subject with Mr. Mellon, I have today, since this question arose, discussed it with an eminent legal authority, and, as I have already stated—probably while the Senator was not in the Chamber——

Mr. BORAH. No; I was here.

Mr. ROBINSON. The condition is insisted upon by the donor.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator understand that that particular condition is insisted upon?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; I do not understand categorically, that the question was raised as to that particular condition, but I do understand that the whole subject matter relating to the conditions was discussed, that many suggestions for the modification of the conditions were made, and that joint resolution represents the conclusion of the conference, which was somewhat prolonged. I have no authority to speak for Mr. Mellon, of course.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I myself have understood that Mr. Mellon was very desirous of holding some influence in the administration of the art gallery, and he does it by reason of the fact that he approves of the first board, and that board is to perpetuate itself. I presume that is his idea, and he wishes to adhere to it, and possibly would not be willing to make the gift without such a condition. I feel, however, that if it were presented to him he would consent. I dislike very much to vote for a self-perpetuating board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. CONNALLY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	La Follette	Pope
Andrews	Davis	Lee	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Dieterich	Lodge	Reynolds
Austin	Duffy	Logan	Robinson
Bachman	Ellender	Lonergan	Russell
Bailey	Frazier	Lundeen	Schwartz
Bilbo	George	McAdoo	Schwellenbach
Black	Gerry	McGill	Sheppard
Bone	Gibson	McKellar	Steiwer
Borah	Gillette	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Bridges	Green	Minton	Thomas, Utah
Brown, Mich.	Guffey	Moore	Townsend
Bulow	Hale	Murray	Tydings
Burke	Hatch	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrd	Hayden	Norris	Van Nuys
Byrnes	Holt	Nye	Wheeler
Capper	Hughes	O'Mahoney	White
Caraway	Johnson, Calif.	Overton
Chavez	Johnson, Colo.	Pepper
Connally	King	Pittman

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer another amendment. In section 2, paragraph (b), on page 3, line 2, I move to strike out the word "general", so the sentence would read:

> A successor shall be chosen by a majority vote of the trustees and shall have a term expiring 10 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was chosen, except that a successor chosen to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of such term shall be chosen only for the remainder of such term.

The purpose of the amendment will be obvious to Senators, namely, to provide that all trustees, including the trustees ex officio, shall have a right to vote on the question of the selection of successors to the general trustees when their terms expire or when they resign. I find nothing in my reading of the letter of the donor which would seem to indicate any objection to such an amendment.

If some negotiations, which are not of record, have taken place in regard to the specific proposal, I do not know of them, but it seems to me, in view of the fact that the trustees are to be self-perpetuating, that those representing the public, so to speak, the Chief Justice, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, should have a right to vote on the selection of successors to the five general trustees when they resign or retire or a vacancy may be created in another manner.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will reject the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask the Senator from Texas whether any representative of the Appropriations Committee was consulted concerning the authorization for the appropriation of money as provided in the joint resolution? I ask merely as a matter of information.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know of any. The provision is simply for an authorization and not an appropriation. That question will have to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to offer another amendment. On page 7, at the end of the bill, I propose to add a new subsection to read as follows:

> (e) The right to amend this act is expressedly reserved.

I offer the amendment in order to meet the situation which may develop in the long future when Congress may have reasons, which cannot now be foreseen, for believing that in the best interests of the public the provisions relating to the administration of the gallery should be changed. If such a provision as I have proposed is written into the measure, no question could be raised at that time to estop Congress from taking action on the ground that the donor was not in possession of the information that Congress reserved the right to amend the act.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Whether or not we would have the right to amend it without such a provision, the amendment which the Senator suggests would give notice that if the Congress should conclude in the future that it objects to the continuance of a self-perpetuating board, it reserved the right to amend the act in that respect.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. After listening to the discussion of the legal aspects of the situation by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], I am offering the amendment not so much on the theory that it is necessary in order to preserve the legal right of Congress to amend in the future, if it shall become necessary, the provision for the governing of the art gallery and the collection of objects of art, but in order that the act itself may show that at the time the gift was accepted the donor was placed upon notice that Congress was reserving to itself the right to amend the act.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the effect of the amendment would be to avoid the charge of bad faith in case it ever became desirable or necessary to amend the act. We assume we have the right to do that which the amendment would give us the right to do, and if we do not expressly so state, in view of the debate which has taken place, we may certainly be charged with bad faith if we undertake to do so in the future. It seems to me the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be rejected. I would much prefer to adopt straight-out the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and tell Mr. Mellon now what we will do and what we will not do, than to tie on a clause like this saying in effect, "We will accept your gift on certain conditions, but we are not going to tell you what we are going to do about it a little later."

Mr. ROBINSON. Or, "We are going to reserve the right to repudiate the conditions upon which you made the gift."

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have no doubt, as I said before, that Congress can repeal the act if it chooses to do so. It can modify it. It does not deprive itself of its legislative power by passing the act. At the same time, I agree that we ought to feel bound not only in order to get the gift to accept the conditions, but also to conform to the conditions in order to keep the gift. If we do not want the gift, let us reject it. If we do want it, let us take it on the conditions laid down.

Mr. CONNALLY. I agree with the Senator. The amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin does not announce anything now. Congress can repeal any act when it gets ready to do so. That does not touch the question of good faith. We always have the right to enact a new law, and if, for any sound reason, in the future a modification of the method of appointment of these trustees should appear wise or necessary, under the doctrine suggested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], a little while ago, we could enact such measure as might be necessary to accomplish that purpose. I would rather tell Mr. Mellon, "No, we do not want your art gallery", than to say to him, "We are going to accept it theoretically on your terms, but we are going to reserve the right to back out next month if we want to do so." That is what is really meant by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The only thing that prompted me to offer the amendment was a statement made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and others—namely, that if the Congress accepted the gift upon the terms provided in the joint resolution, while Congress might not be estopped from amending the act in the future from the legal or constitutional standpoint, yet it would be estopped on the ground that a moral breach of the understanding and terms and conditions of the original gift was involved.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment, if the Senator will pardon me. It is conceded that this arrangement is to last so long as the Government of the United States lasts. I do not think any Senator or any donor or anyone else can look into the long future and say that in this year 1937 we have set up a provision for the administration of this gallery which should not be changed in the future. In order to reserve that right, and that there should not be any misunderstanding, I think my amendment should be agreed to.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely desire to say that, in my opinion, we do not relieve ourselves from liability to the charge of bad faith when we accept the express conditions of this offer and then say that we reserve the right to change them without specifying in what particular. We should thereby give no definite information either to the public or to the donor. It would not salve my conscience to say, "Yes; I take your gift, and take it on the conditions you prescribe, but after I get the gift I will repudiate the conditions, repeal or modify the act accepting your conditions, and leave you possibly without a remedy."

If there were here any question of imposition on the public; if there arose under this joint resolution any question of inability of the public to secure its rights; if it were a franchise, the issue would be different. This, however, is a gift for the benefit of the public, and the only object in putting a restraint on the method of selection of the trustees is to prevent just what it is proposed shall be done.

I again suggest that in practice it is the duty of the Senate either to accept the gift with the conditions which have been attached to it, or to reject it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, as I understand, however, the joint resolution must pass before the property leaves the possession of Mr. Mellon. That is correct, is it not? He retains control of it until that time?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know who has possession of the property; I do not think that is material; but Mr. Mellon will have the title to the property until the joint resolution becomes law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is what I understood.

Mr. ROBINSON. Then, the title will vest in the Smithsonian Institution.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Therefore, no deduction could be drawn from the acceptance of this amendment that any advantage had been taken of Mr. Mellon.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, of course he would have the opportunity to withdraw his offer or to decline to carry out the gift because the acceptance was not in compliance with the conditions of the gift; but I have not yet reached the point when, in order to assure that some political authority may appoint the trustees of this institution, I am willing to endanger the loss of this property to the Government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That may be the Senator's position about the matter; but my point is that so far as the present situation is concerned, it is still within the full control of Congress, and that is the necessity for passing a joint resolution on the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the Senator understood the significance of my former remarks on this phase of the subject to be that if we incorporate in this measure a provision reserving the right to repeal, amend, or modify the act, and accepting it with the conditions attached, we should then be in position to disregard the conditions, if we saw fit to do so, by subsequent legislation, and Mr. Mellon would have no remedy then, after the statute was enacted. Of course, it is immaterial about the conditions which are imposed if the gift never becomes effective.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Precisely; but I drew the inference from the remarks of the Senator that we were offering to accept this gift under certain conditions, and then that we were going to change our minds about it without the donor being on notice in regard to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; we are going to take the property if the joint resolution becomes a law and Mr. Mellon does not withdraw his proposal.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON. And after we have taken the property, according to the Senator's theory, we can say, "We repudiate the conditions upon which we accepted it."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We can modify those conditions if Mr. Mellon is on notice that we reserve that right; whereas I contend that if this amendment is not agreed to the position taken by the Senator from Arkansas will be sound, and that in perpetuity we shall be bound to accept this self-perpetuating board of general trustees.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to point out that the committee has already violated a condition named by the donor. The joint resolution which is presented to us upon the floor does not comply with the requirements laid down by Mr. Mellon. I read from page 4 of the hearings before the Committee on the Library in the House of Representatives. The sixth article of the conditions named by Mr. Mellon was as follows:

> Sixth. It shall be provided that the gallery and its property shall be controlled and its affairs managed by a competent, self-perpetuating board of nine trustees, of whom five shall be named originally by the donor, with the approval of the Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The joint resolution which the committee has presented to us reads quite differently. It reads as follows:

> The general trustees first taking office shall be chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, subject to the approval of the donor.

In other words, in drafting the joint resolution the committee has exactly reversed the condition laid down by the donor; and it seems to me that every argument which has been made upon this floor against all of the suggested amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin goes by the board by reason of the action of the committee itself.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, that modification of the original letter from Mr. Mellon was agreed to by his agents in the conference where all these conditions were taken up and discussed, and the joint resolution was drafted with the understanding that that provision is acceptable to Mr. Mellon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is it not possible that some of these provisions which have been offered by way of amendment might also be accepted?

Mr. CONNALLY. I congratulate the Senator from Wyoming on unearthing this terrible crime of which the committee has been guilty.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is not a crime; it is just an error.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is not an error.

Mr. CONNALLY. As was suggested before, all of these matters were gone over repeatedly with representatives of Mr. Mellon and the Department of Justice. The measure now presented was the final result. I do not know what transpired back and forth during the negotiations; but Mr. Mellon's representatives, his legal counsel and others, were present in the committee and approved the joint resolution as reported. If that is a breach of faith on the part of anyone, I am sorry. This is Mr. Mellon's offer. Take it or leave it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether the committee discussed with the representatives of Mr. Mellon the question of how these trustees were to be selected, and whether the committee itself ascertained whether any modification or changes could be made in these provisions, so far as the trustees and their self-perpetuating character were concerned, which Mr. Mellon would accept?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator that the fact was repeatedly stressed by representatives of Mr. Mellon that the so-called self-perpetuating feature of this board was of the highest importance. The reason was not to run amuck with the gallery, but to maintain the standard of excellence of the exhibits in the gallery. That was made clear by Mr. Mellon's representatives. I did not suggest to them the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin nor the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho. I accepted their statement that the self-perpetuating feature was essential and acted upon it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That was my understanding of the matter, and my reason for stating that I did not believe that anyone had really negotiated about this question to ascertain whether or not changes in the proposal would be acceptable to Mr. Mellon.

Mr. CONNALLY. The question was raised, and these gentlemen said that was one of the stipulations and requirements; that the one feature which Mr. Mellon was insistent upon was the preservation of the high standard of the exhibits, and that could be done only by a self-perpetuating board.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I inquire whether the Senate committee amendment has been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has not been agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In section 5, paragraph (b), on page 5, line 21, after the words "shall be", it is proposed to strike out "exhibited in" and insert "included in the permanent collection of", so as to make the paragraph read:

(b) In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no work of art shall be included in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Art unless they are of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I inquire whether this committee amendment has been agreed to by Mr. Mellon.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I really am not intimate with Mr. Mellon. I never saw him but once in my life, and I did not personally consult Mr. Mellon about these two or three lines that were put in.

Mr. NORRIS. Then this committee amendment ought to be rejected, if it does not have Mr. Mellon's approval.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me suggest, however, that Mr. Mellon's representatives were present, and I understood that they agreed to the committee amendment, and had no objection to it.

Mr. NORRIS. That makes it perfectly satisfactory. If his representatives agreed to it, it is all right with me.

Mr. CONNALLY. I knew that whatever Mr. Mellon's will was would be the will of the Senator from Nebraska. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Why, certainly. Whatever is agreeable to Mr. Mellon, I am for. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. I am glad to hear the Senator make that statement. It is the experience of many Senators that they become more conservative the longer they serve. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I am one of those who are very grateful that this great beneficence is to be available to the American people. I think it is characteristic of the condition that should prevail in a democracy that the great works of art, great music, and great dramatic works should be available to the masses of the people. But I am solicitous that we be not misunderstood in the standard we shall set for a national art gallery.

Beginning on line 18, page 5, in the section which is proposed to be amended by the committee we find this language:

(b) In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no work of art shall be included in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Art unless they are of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

I for one would have been perfectly agreeable to leaving it to the discretion of the board provided for by the joint resolution to make all of the selections of the works of art that shall go into the gallery, and I think the measure might well have stopped with the word "standard", in line 19, so that subsection (b) would have read thus:

In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard.

In other words, if the joint resolution had merely provided that a high standard should always prevail in the gallery, it would have been enough, or if it had made no provision at all as to that, and had left it to the discretion of the trustees, I would have had no fear as to what the result would have been. But that has not been done. There has been inserted at least an intimation that in order to prevent the introduction into the gallery of inferior works of art no work of art shall be included in the permanent collection of the national gallery of art unless it is of a similar high standard of quality with those already in the collection.

I propose an amendment at the end of line 24, on page 5, in the following words:

Provided, however, That this provision shall not be construed as limiting the judgment of the board of trustees in the selection of works of art to be included permanently in the National Gallery of Art to works of any particular school or period.

The obvious purpose is to leave the discretion of the board untrammeled, and I sincerely hope the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment, which would negative the intimation, which the present language of the measure might carry, that we want this national art gallery never to have in it works of art save those in the same category with those which now appear in the gallery.

I sincerely hope the privilege may be accorded of making this an expanding art gallery, that only a standard of good quality shall prevail, that we shall not insist that the gallery be frozen into categories as they may now exist, and that no given period or school of art shall forever determine the standards of what the public may see in the gallery.

Mr. CONNALLY. The object of the committee in the amendment on page 5 to strike out the words "exhibited in" and to insert "included in the permanent collection of" was to meet this kind of condition. There is no prohibition against the exhibition in this collection of other works of art temporarily and from time to time, but for permanent addition to the gallery it would require that the works be of similar—not the same, but of similar—high standard and quality as those already in the collection.

I have suggested in the debate heretofore that the Smithsonian Institution has another art gallery open to all other artists, and the Walsh bill proposes a further extension of that. But one of the theories of the gift we are now discussing is that the gallery shall be maintained on a high standard of quality, and that no permanent addition shall be made unless the works contained in it be of a similar high quality. That does not mean they have to be of the same school or from the same nation, but it means they must be works of art of a high standard.

I am not capable of passing on these art treasures and their relative merits, but the board provided for would be composed of men who would be capable of so doing, and I should much prefer to rest the judgment as to what ought to be included in the permanent collection to this board of experts and artists than to try to undertake it here on the floor of the Senate. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. PEPPER. I am not sure that I altogether understand what may actually be in the mind of the Senator. Are we to infer from his statement that he does not contemplate that a modern work of art shall ever be placed in this gallery?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. PEPPER. What the Senator wants to have prescribed is a standard of good quality. Is not that correct?

Mr. CONNALLY. All I want is the language of the measure before us.

Mr. PEPPER. I thought the Senator was more wedded to a principle, perhaps, than to particular language.

Mr. CONNALLY. That the national gallery of art shall not have included in it works of art unless they are of a high standard of quality similar to that of those already in the gallery. Quality is not a matter that is limited by the statute of limitations. Quality may exist today as well as it existed 2,000 years ago. The only requirement is that the works of art be of a similar high quality with those already in the gallery, not anybody's particular brand or anybody's name or any school, but if tomorrow an artist should produce a great work and it was a high standard of quality it would be eligible to be included in this gallery.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator have any objection to the provision?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do; I hope the Senate will reject it, because the language in the measure has been thoroughly gone over with the various agencies and representatives, and we think it expresses just what ought to be done and ought to be adopted as it is written.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator think this language carries even an intimation to the trustees governing their conduct in the future so as to infer that this shall be a national gallery in which shall be embraced only the old masters and no modern art shall ever enter its portals?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not see anything in the joint resolution which would prohibit the inclusion of works of modern art.

Mr. PEPPER. Then why does the Senator object to the amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. I think it is altogether unnecessary and is really somewhat of a limitation on the judgment of the board. Under the measure as we are proposing it the board would be left free to select any work of art, whether it were old or whether it were new, whether it were of the Flemish school or of the Spanish school, whether it were of the Roman period or of Renaissance, or of the particular hour in which we live. Why try to fetter the board? Why try to tell these experts in art, "We are willing to have you select these works of art if you will do it as we tell you to do it" I am not willing to have such a provision in the measure. I do not believe the Senate could, by legislative act, paint a great picture. It never yet has painted one. [Laughter.]

Mr. PEPPER. If that is the conviction of the Senator, why did he insert any provision at all to govern such a board?

Mr. CONNALLY. We wanted to insure that the pictures should be of a high standard, comparable with those included in the gift.

Mr. PEPPER. Does the Senator think the board would see to that without our telling them to do it?

Mr. CONNALLY. Would the Senator from Florida want to exhibit the grapefruit, and the oranges, and all the other marvelous products of his State, and have all the inferior products of some other State brought in and mixed and mingled with them and corrupt the whole mass, or would he want the requirement made that they come up to the standard of excellence and quality of the fruit grown in the Senator's State?

Mr. PEPPER. I understand what the Senator has in mind. The Florida grapefruit would appear as the ultimate in artistry by itself, but I suppose only one of the old masters could paint a picture of the Texas grapefruit fit for inclusion in the gallery. [Laughter.]

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], as well as to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], that if they want real oranges they should come to California and taste some of our fruit. I should like to see an amendment to the joint resolution making it mandatory that such paintings of fruits as have just been suggested be included in this great collection of art.

Mr. CONNALLY. I agree with the Senator from Florida and the Senator from California that their grapefruit is a product of art. The Texas grapefruit is a product of nature. It is not a reproduction. It is the original.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair state the parliamentary situation. The question is now upon the committee amendment, on page 5, line 21, after the words "shall be", to strike out "exhibited in" and insert in lieu thereof "included in the permanent collection of."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the bottom of page 5, after line 24, it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That this provision shall not be construed as limiting the judgment of the board of trustees in the selection of works of art to be included permanently in the National Art Gallery to works of any particular school or period.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President, I am about to offer an amendment which I think will meet the approval not only of Mr. Mellon but of the chairman of the committee. It is, on page 5, line 23, after the word "unless", to strike out "they are" and to insert in lieu thereof "it be", since "work of art" is singular, like this debate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I defer to the superior information and artistic knowledge of the Senator from Rhode Island. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, in line 23, on page 4, I move that the words "or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended" be stricken out. Unless these words are stricken out, it would appear that the self-perpetuating board of trustees will be able to appoint subordinate employees who will not be governed by the same rules as to salary which apply to all other employees.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] calls my attention to the fact that the same sentence provides that all these appointees shall not be subject to the civil-service law. I do not know whether or not Mr. Mellon insisted upon that exemption, or whether or not his representative insisted upon it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in line 19 appear the words—

> Such director, assistant director, secretary, and chief curator shall be compensated from trust funds available to the board for the purpose, and their appointment and salaries shall not be subject—

And so forth. That applies only to those particular officers whose compensation is paid out of the income from the donation of $5,000,000 contributed by Mr. Mellon. Therefore, I think they ought not to be put under civil service. He is furnishing the pay and having them compensated; and I do think the board ought to be allowed some leeway in not having to go down to the Civil Service Commission in order to get somebody who knows something about pictures.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask with reference to other employees whether there is any provision governing their exact method of appointment?

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not know of any.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the Senator think they should be appointed under civil service?

Mr. CONNALLY. Frankly, I do not, if the Senator wants me to answer that question "yes" or "no."

Mr. BLACK. I understood this afternoon that one objection to having the board appointed by the President was that it might be that employees then would be placed on the basis of patronage or patriotism. It seems to me that if this board is to be self-perpetuating, it certainly would be proper that the officers appointed should be under civil service, rather than to be appointed by this self-perpetuating board. I refer to the officers involved when we go beyond those mentioned by the Senator as being paid for out of the trust fund, if we do go beyond them, and I understand from the joint resolution that we do.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Texas if it is not a fact that although the four men who are mentioned here—the director, assistant director, secretary, and chief curator—are to be paid out of the income from the trust fund established by Mr. Mellon, the whole purpose of the joint resolution is to have the building itself, the employees who run it, and the general upkeep and repair and maintenance of the building paid for by the Government of the United States? That is the whole obligation that it has assumed. Inasmuch as all public buildings are under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department, I presume that from time to time the Secretary of the Treasury will submit to the Budget Bureau an estimate of the necessary amounts required to conduct and operate this building, and it would be passed upon, through the Budget Bureau, by an appropriation by Congress in the usual way. Civil-service rules may apply to that situation. I do not know with certainty as to that; but, in any case, it is perfectly clear that if the Government assumes this obligation it will be dealt with in the ordinary manner, and through the departmental heads under whose jurisdiction the operation and maintenance of this building rests.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator has gone over this measure carefully, and I ask him if there is any provision in it which indicates whether these employees shall or shall not be appointed through civil service.

Mr. McADOO. I do not see any such provision.

Mr. BLACK. I am asking for information. Is it or is it not true that under this joint resolution the Government could pay for all these employees, and they would all be appointed by the board without reference to civil service?

Mr. McADOO. The board has nothing to do with the appointment of the employees of the building. The maintenance of the building undoubtedly will be under the Treasury Department.

Mr. BLACK. What about the additional employees? Are they to be paid out of the trust fund?

Mr. McADOO. There are no other employees except those whom the Government may necessarily employ for the purpose of operating and maintaining the building.

I assume, of course, and I think it is obvious from the joint resolution as presented, that at the proper time, after the building is completed, the Secretary of the Treasury, because the operation and maintenance of all public buildings are under the control of the Treasury Department, will submit his estimates for the amount required to operate this building. The employees so chosen may be chosen from the civil service, or in any other way Congress may require, or the departmental heads may require, or the President himself, by executive order, may require.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McADOO. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In view of the fact that the chairman of the committee and the Senator from California feel that these particular employees should be exempted from the civil-service law and from the Classification Act of 1923, and since they are to be paid from trust funds, I ask the Senator from California and the Senator from Texas if there would be objection to another amendment, to add at the end of line 23, on page 4, this language:

> Provided, That all other employees shall be appointed in accordance with the civil-service law?

Mr. McADOO. I have no authority to say what the committee may desire to do about it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from California would have no objection to that?

Mr. McADOO. I should object to it, because I do not think it has any proper place in this measure. The clause, providing that the director, the assistant director, the secretary, and chief curator shall be paid out of this fund, excludes the others and of necessity they must be drawn from the civil-service list.

It is preposterous to say that the chief curator need not be a man expert in art. I do not think such a man could possibly be taken from the civil-service list. Therefore, it is highly proper that these men should be paid out of the trust fund. As to the other employees, it is a matter wholly within the jurisdiction of the United States Government and can be dealt with in the usual way.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. We are dealing with a self-perpetuating board, and it seems to me to be the part of wisdom to throw around the great power we are giving to the board all the safeguards we possibly can.

Mr. McADOO. The board has not anything whatever to do with the appointment of employees who are going to operate the building. That is wholly within the jurisdiction of the Treasury Department.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not see where that is to be read into the language of the joint resolution.

Mr. McADOO. It does not have to be. It is so by virtue of the general law of the land.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The fifth clause of the grant reads as follows:

> Fifth. The upkeep of the gallery building and other administrative expenses and costs of operation and functioning of the gallery for the public purpose for which it is designed shall be provided for annually in appropriations to be made by Congress, as for the other units of the Smithsonian Institution.

It is not at all certain to me from that language that the statement of the Senator is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I think the Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] is correct in his assumption that all the clerks, watchmen, and similar employees are to be drawn from the civil-service list, and for this reason: In the first place, the art gallery is to be a branch of the Smithsonian Institution, so the same law that applies to the selection of clerks and clerical assistants for the Smithsonian Institution itself would apply to the national gallery of art. Even if that be not true, under the general law, as I understand, unless clerks are exempted from the civil-service law, they are included, and that is why it was necessary to exempt the director, the assistant director, the secretary, and the chief curator by specific language.

Had they not been exempted specifically they would have had to be selected from the civil-service list. This is merely an exception to the general rule.

Any Senator who desires to have a watchman appointed, when the employees of the national gallery of art are selected, may have his desire gratified if the applicant's name appears on the civil-service list of eligibles. The same thing applies to the selection of charwomen, because under the general law and under the law governing the Smithsonian Institution, except for the specific exemptions, they would have to come under the civil-service law. I commend that to the attention and thought of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, as a citizen of Pittsburgh, Pa., I wish to express appreciation of the spirit which has prompted Mr. Mellon to bring such rich treasures of art to the Nation's capital, where all may enjoy them. Differences of opinion between us should not obscure the fact that his genius in finance and industry has breathed new life into many important avenues of American business, giving employment to thousands of workers. His labors have touched to strength the industrial development of various natural resources of the Nation. All this will be more clearly seen with the passing of time when the heat of party passion has subsided. I am sure that all of us will find profit and pleasure in the added beauty which Mr. Mellon now proposes to bring to Washington.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 73) was passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, MARCH 15, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Shepherd and Bishop of our souls, let our unfolding sense be filled with the truth, for in Thee is all wisdom. Thou art righteous in all Thy ways and holy in all Thy works; Thou art nigh unto them that call upon Thee. Bless our Speaker and the Congress assembled. Enrich us with the spirit that sees the best in everything; clothe us all with the spirit of the Master, and thus may we build ourselves into the public and private circles of our fellow men. Heavenly Father, those who are burdened with affliction and cares do Thou gird them with Thy comfort and strength; O throw the light of Thy love upon all the scenes of human life. Almighty God, give us faith to believe that throughout the ages one increasing purpose runs. Lord God, let truth, justice, and righteousness be augmented a thousandfold in all the earth, and peace shall reign among men even as it is in heaven. We wait and still wait for that day, for that glorious day whose dawning is not yet as the twilight upon the mountains. O hasten the morning and let it advance and roll on. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, March 12, 1937, was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this afternoon after the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] has completed his address, I may be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a radio address delivered by me recently on the subject of the Supreme Court.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture may have permission to sit during sessions of the House this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Calendar day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the calendar.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the first bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 28, to authorize the deportation of aliens who secured preference-quota or nonquota visas through fraud by contracting marriage solely to fraudulently expedite admission to the United States, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objections.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall be constrained to object if no one is here to explain the purpose of this bill.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, in view of the fact the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has the call on Calendar Wednesday of this week, it might be well if we passed the bill over without prejudice until Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. This bill requires three objections.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY STAY IN THE UNITED STATES OF CERTAIN ALIENS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 27, to authorize the shortening or termination of temporary stay in the United States of certain aliens not admitted for permanent residence, to authorize the deportation of certain aliens admitted for permanent residence, and for other purposes.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1924

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3471, to permit alien wives of American citizens who were married prior to the approval of the Immigration Act of 1924 to enter the United States.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill also be passed over without prejudice for the same reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California.

There was no objection.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACTS OF CONGRESS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2260, to provide for appearance on behalf of and appeal by the United States in certain cases in which the constitutionality of acts of Congress is involved.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

CHAPMAN FIELD, FLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4287, to authorize the Attorney General to settle outstanding claims against Chapman Field, Fla., and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General is hereby authorized to settle, adjust, and compromise any and all outstanding claims, including that of the Royal Citrus Groves Co., adverse to the Government's title to Chapman Field, Fla., including all accretions, relictions, shoals, islands, tidelands, and underwater lands lying seaward of the fastlands included in the United States Public Land Survey of 1847, and to take such steps as he may deem necessary to remove all clouds upon the Government's title thereto, and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for such purpose.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

The Clerk called the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 217) providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the area bounded by Seventh Street, Constitution Avenue, Fourth Street, and North Mall Drive NW., in the District of Columbia, is hereby appropriated to the Smithsonian Institution as a site for a National Gallery of Art. The Smithsonian Institution is authorized to permit the A. W. Mellon Educational and Charitable Trust (hereinafter referred to as the donor) to construct on said site for the Smithsonian Institution a building to be designated the National Gallery of Art, and to remove any existing structure and landscape the grounds within said area. The adjoining area bounded by Fourth Street, Pennsylvania Avenue, Third Street, and North Mall Drive NW., in the District of Columbia, is hereby reserved as a site for future additions to the National Gallery of Art. The project shall be in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Commission of Fine Arts.

SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established in the Smithsonian Institution a bureau, which shall be directed by a board to be known as the Trustees of the National Gallery of Art, whose duty it shall be to maintain and administer the National Gallery of Art and site thereof and to execute such other functions as are vested in the board by this act. The board shall be composed as follows: The Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, ex officio; and five general trustees who shall be citizens of the United States, to be chosen as hereinafter provided. No officer or employee of the Federal Government shall be eligible to be chosen as a general trustee.

(b) The general trustees first taking office shall be chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, subject to the approval of the donor, and shall have terms expiring one each on July 1 of 1939, 1941, 1943, 1945, and 1947, as designated by the Board of Regents. A successor shall be chosen by a majority vote of the general trustees and shall have a term expiring 10 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was chosen, except that a successor chosen to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of such term shall be chosen only for the remainder of such term.

SEC. 3. Upon completion of the National Gallery of Art, the board shall accept for the Smithsonian Institution as a gift from the donor a collection of works of art which shall be housed and exhibited in the National Gallery of Art.

SEC. 4. (a) The faith of the United States is pledged that, on completion of the National Gallery of Art by the donor in accordance with the terms of this act and the acquisition from the donor of the collection of works of art, the United States will provide such funds as may be necessary for the upkeep of the National Gallery of Art and the administrative expenses and costs of operation thereof, including the protection and care of works of art acquired by the board, so that the National Gallery of Art shall be at all times properly maintained and the works of art contained therein shall be exhibited regularly to the general public. For these purposes there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary.

(b) The board is authorized to accept for the Smithsonian Institution and to hold and administer gifts, bequests, or devises of money, securities, or other property of whatsoever character for the benefit of the National Gallery of Art. Unless otherwise restricted by the terms of the gift, bequest, or devise, the board is authorized to sell or exchange and to invest or reinvest in such investments as it may determine from time to time the moneys, securities, or other property composing trust funds given, bequeathed, or devised to or for the benefit of the National Gallery of Art. The income as and when collected shall be placed in such depositaries as the board shall determine and shall be subject to expenditure by the board.

(c) The board shall appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a director, an assistant director, a secretary, and a chief curator of the National Gallery of Art, and of such other officers and employees of the National Gallery of Art as may be necessary for the efficient administration of the functions of the board. Such director, assistant director, secretary, and chief curator shall be compensated from trust funds available to the board for the purpose, and their appointment and salaries shall not be subject to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The director, assistant director, secretary, and chief curator shall be well qualified by experience and training to perform the duties of their office, and the original appointment to each such office shall be subject to the approval of the donor.

(d) The actions of the board, including any payment made or directed to be made by it from any trust funds, shall not be subject to review by any officer or agency other than a court of law.

SEC. 5. (a) The board is authorized to adopt an official seal which shall be judicially noticed and to make such bylaws, rules, and regulations as it deems necessary for the administration of its functions under this act, including, among other matters, bylaws, rules, and regulations relating to the acquisition, exhibition, and loan of works of art, the administration of its trust funds, and the organization and procedure of the board. The board may function notwithstanding vacancies, and three members of the board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

(b) In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no works of art shall be exhibited in the National Gallery of Art unless they are of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

(c) The board shall have all the usual powers and obligations of a trustee in respect of all trust funds administered by it and all works of art acquired by it.

(d) The board shall submit to the Smithsonian Institution an annual report of its operations under this act, including a detailed statement of all acquisitions and loans of works of art and of all public and private moneys received and disbursed.

SEC. 6. (a) The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to close Sixth Street NW., within the boundaries of the site for the National Gallery of Art. The National Capital Park and Planning Commission shall determine the building lines and approve the plan of approaches for said gallery, and shall also make recommendations for the widening and adjustment of Third, Seventh, Ninth, and such other streets in the vicinity as may be necessary and desirable to provide for the traffic which would otherwise use Sixth Street.

(b) Section 10 of the Public Building Act, approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., p. 881), relating to the George Washington Memorial Building, and all provisions of law amendatory thereof, are hereby repealed.

(c) The existing bureau of the Smithsonian Institution now designated as a national gallery of art shall hereafter be known as the National Collection of Fine Arts.

(d) The fifth paragraph under the heading "Smithsonian Institution" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1924, approved February 13, 1923 (42 Stat. L. 1235), relating to the erection of a national gallery of art, is hereby repealed.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER NEAR RULO, NEBR.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 192, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Rulo, Nebr.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE BETWEEN CEDAR POINT AND DAUPHIN ISLAND, ALA.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3874, to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge and causeway across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point and Dauphin Island, Ala.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge and causeway between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, Ala., heretofore authorized to be built by Dauphin Island Railway & Harbor Co., its successors and assigns (Mobile County, Ala., and Highway Bridge Commission, Inc., an Alabama corporation, transferees), as last extended by Public Law No. 427, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved January 27, 1936, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from the date of approval of this act.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 4, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That it shall not be lawful to commence the construction of said bridge until plans thereof shall again be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers and by the Secretary of War."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER NEAR GARRISON, N. DAK.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 361, to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N. Dak.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at or near Garrison, N. Dak., authorized to be built by the State of North Dakota, by the acts of Congress approved February 10, 1932, and heretofore extended by acts of Congress approved February 14, 1933, and June 12, 1934, May 24, 1935, and June 5, 1936, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 12, 1937.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER BETWEEN DECATUR, NEBR., AND ONAWA, IOWA

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 996, to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between the towns of Decatur, Nebr., and Onawa, Iowa.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River between the towns of Decatur, Nebr., and Onawa, Iowa, authorized to be built by the county of Burt, State of Nebraska, by section 29 of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1935, heretofore extended by act of Congress approved June 19, 1936, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from August 30, 1937.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER NEAR SOUTH SIOUX CITY, NEBR., AND SIOUX CITY, IOWA

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 997, to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the cities of South Sioux City, Nebr., and Sioux City, Iowa.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge across the Missouri River, at or near the cities of South Sioux City, Nebr., and Sioux City, Iowa, authorized to be built by the county of Dakota, State of Nebraska, by section 30 of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1935, heretofore extended by act of Congress approved June 19, 1936, are hereby further extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from August 30, 1937.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SCAJAQUADA CREEK, ERIE COUNTY, N. Y.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 175, declaring Scajaquada Creek, Erie County, N. Y., to be a nonnavigable stream.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, That Scajaquada Creek, Erie County, N. Y., is hereby declared to be not a navigable water of the United States within the meaning of the laws enacted by the Congress for the preservation and protection of such waters.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out all of line 4 after the word "be" and all of lines 5 and 6 and insert "nonnavigable east of a line 130 feet west of the west line of Niagara Street, city of Buffalo, county of Erie, N. Y., within the meaning of the Constitution and laws of the United States."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that wherever the word "nonnavigable" appears in the title or the body of the bill, a hyphen be inserted between the two "n's."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT PROPERTY, AMOY, CHINA

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 3473) to authorize the Secretary of State to sell for a price, transfer, and convey the title, rights, and interest of this Government in a lot situated at Sin Lu T'ou Jetty, Kulangsu, Amoy, China.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to sell, transfer, and convey all the title, rights, and interest of this Government in a foreshore lot, approximately 100 feet long by 100 feet wide, situated at Sin Lu T'ou Jetty, sometimes called "Lu Erh Chiao", Kulangsu, Amoy, China, for a price of not less than 1,000 yuan (Chinese dollars): Provided, That the net amount received from such sale remaining after the deduction of all necessary fees and expenses shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

TO AUTHORIZE CERTAIN OFFICERS, ETC., TO ADMINISTER OATHS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 5122) to authorize certain officers and employees to administer oaths to expense accounts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I wonder if the intent of the committee is expressed, wherein it provides that these clerks, and so forth, who are required and empowered to administer oaths, are required to account for travel or other expenses against the United States? The way the bill reads now these heads of departments and clerks are required, empowered, and authorized to account for travel or other expenses. In reading the bill it would appear to me that what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] had in mind was that they be authorized to administer oaths for travel account, but that they themselves would not be required in addition to their other functions to account for travel expense except as it applies to them.

Mr. COCHRAN. The bill was introduced in the way it was sent here by the Agricultural Department. It has been approved by the Director of the Budget and likewise approved by the Comptroller General in its present form. Some of these people are in sections of the country where they cannot reach those who are now authorized to administer oaths. There are only a few. If the gentleman feels that an amendment will be beneficial to reach the result, I am satisfied to accept the amendment. Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate the work of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I have a great deal of respect for his opinion especially when it has to do with clarifying amendments and it is for that reason that I am sure I am not making a mistake when I accept his amendment. I am only trying to serve Government employees who are at a great disadvantage in complying with existing law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of the Sundry Civil Appropriation Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, approved August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. 487), be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. Postmasters, assistant postmasters, collectors of customs, collectors of internal revenue, chief clerks of the various executive departments, independent establishments, and other Government agencies, or of bureaus thereof, the superintendent, the acting superintendent, custodian, and principal clerks of the various national parks and other Government reservations, superintendent, acting superintendent, and principal clerks of the different Indian superintendents or Indian agencies, chiefs of field parties, and any officer or employee of any executive department, independent establishment, or other Government agency, in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, who shall have been designated in writing for such purpose by the head of the department, establishment, or agency concerned, are required, empowered, and authorized, when requested, to administer oaths, required by law or otherwise, to account for travel or other expenses against the United States, with like force and effect as officers having a seal; for such services when so rendered, or when rendered on demand by notaries public, who at the time are also salaried officers or employees of the United States, no charge shall be made; and no fee or money paid for the services herein described shall be paid or reimbursed by the United States."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WOLCOTT: Page 2, line 11, strike out the comma after the word "otherwise."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EMIGRATION OF FILIPINOS FROM UNITED STATES TO PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 2305) to extend the time for applying for and receiving benefits under the act entitled "An act to provide means by which certain Filipinos can emigrate from the United States", approved July 10, 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to get some information about the bill. As I understand the bill, it simply extends the time for a year. It does not in any way impinge upon the amendment agreed to in the bill last year, to the effect that when a man takes advantage of this bill he has no right to come back. That is still in the law, is it? Does this bill do anything else than that?

Mr. WELCH. The Act of 1935 was limited to 1 year. That time was curtailed due to the maritime labor troubles on the Pacific coast. This bill asks for an additional year in which to repatriate Filipinos to their native land.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It extends the time from December 31, 1937, to December 31, 1938.

Mr. WELCH. One year additional time in which to repatriate them.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There are no changes in this bill at all. It simply reenacts the same identical bill, with the same amendment and the same language. It simply extends the time for 1 year.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide means by which certain Filipinos can emigrate from the United States", approved July 10, 1935, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. No application for the benefits of this act shall be accepted by any officer of the Immigration Service after December 1, 1938; and all benefits under this act shall finally terminate on December 31, 1938, unless the journey has been started on or before that date, in which case the journey to Manila shall be completed."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after the figures "1935", strike out the word "is" and insert "as heretofore amended by the act approved June 4, 1936 (Public Law No. 645, 74th Cong.), is further."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTROL OF INCIPIENT OR EMERGENCY OUTBREAKS OF INSECT PESTS

The Clerk called the next business, Senate Joint Resolution 75, making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill, as originally introduced in the Senate, was an authorization, but it has been amended by the Committee on Agriculture so as to carry with it an appropriation of $100,000. I can see no objection to an authorization, although perhaps the amount as fixed by the Senate, $5,000,000, is excessive. The House has been appropriating for a number of years for practically all of the purposes mentioned in the resolution, but the Committee on Agriculture is without authority to report appropriations to the House, and unless there is an agreement to eliminate the language of the committee amendment, which, in effect, makes an appropriation of $100,000, I shall be compelled to object.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, as I take the floor I see the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has just come into the chamber, and of course he will answer all questions as to why the language used in the bill is necessary. Mr. Speaker, I have had a number of telegrams and letters from Missouri pleading for the passage of this legislation. Mr. NELSON, of Missouri, introduced a bill which is a companion bill to this Senate bill. Mr. NELSON is now on the way to the Chamber having been detained at a meeting of the Committee on Agriculture and if you will let me speak his language I can tell you that Missouri farmers are living in fear as to what is going to happen to their crops this year unless the Government immediately gets busy and destroys these pests. While I represent a city district, I am interested in our farmers who buy what we manufacture in the cities when they have money and there is one thing certain and that is until the farmers are able to make and spend money we are not going to get out of this depression. This is to take care of an emergency.

Mr. TARVER. Then the application should be made to the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, which is now considering agricultural appropriations, and no effort should be made by the Committee on Agriculture, a legislative committee, to report appropriations to the House. The language is subject to a point of order.

Mr. COCHRAN. I fully understand, but a deficiency bill is not coming in for a month or so, and the agricultural appropriation bill will not be law for several months. Therefore, if we wait for an appropriation it may be too late to do just exactly what this resolution provides. However, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. JONES] is now present, and he is in a better position to speak on the bill than I am.

Mr. TARVER. I think the chairman of the committee is in substantial accord with what I have said.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment is subject to a point of order the way it is drafted. There are a number of items that will require legislation. The committee expects to go into that a little later. We reported it in this form because it was claimed there was an emergency. It is claimed that these funds should be made immediately available when they would do the most good. Of course, we have no choice but to yield if a point of order is made. I am rather inclined to think, in view of the fact that a number of items in the appropriation bill have been carried on from year to year without specific authority, that as we are getting up these lists and going into the legislation, and in view of the emergency, and in view of Budget approval of this, the gentleman might be willing to waive his point of order on this matter. If he is not, of course, we have no choice.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, the agricultural appropriation bill will be reported to the House within the next 3 or 4 weeks. It seems to me that the statement made by the gentleman from Texas is not sufficient to justify assumption of the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee by the legislative Committee on Agriculture. If the gentleman from Texas will agree that there may go out of the committee amendment the sentence which carries with it an actual appropriation of funds, I shall have no objection to an authorization; but unless that language is taken out of the amendment, I shall be inclined to object.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I rise in connection with the urgency of passing this legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] reserved the right to object, and he has not yielded the floor.

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Montana for an inquiry.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. I wish to call attention, in connection with this question, to the conditions existing in the territory affected by these crickets, and so on.

Mr. TARVER. I have no question about that, may I say to the gentleman, but let me call attention to this fact: The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON], who reported this bill to the House, himself introduced in the House some time ago an appropriation bill for this purpose, which was properly referred to the Committee on Appropriations. A hearing could have been asked before our committee at any time. That committee could have reported back this legislation making actual appropriation just as quickly as did the Committee on Agriculture. There was no reason for going to the legislative committee for an appropriation, when the bill making appropriation was pending before the Appropriations Committee, and is pending there now.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman insists on his point of order, I will offer a correcting amendment.

Mr. TARVER. Is that the amendment which the gentleman showed me the other day?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, I think the amendment will make the correction. It would require action by the Appropriations Committee before the funds become available.

Mr. TARVER. I am not of opinion that the amendment in question goes to the vital point. If the gentleman will consent to striking out the language making the appropriation, I shall be satisfied. That leaves the authorization. There is no reason why the Committee on Appropriations should not act on the matter promptly.

Mr. JONES. I may state to the gentleman from Georgia that I submitted this amendment to the parliamentary clerk and he thinks it makes the proper correction. I would like to offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary question is, Is there objection to present consideration?

Mr. TARVER. I shall be compelled to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. TARVER. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. I may state to the gentleman from Georgia that unless we get some money within the next week we cannot possibly combat these crickets. I appreciate the gentleman's position.

Mr. TARVER. May I inquire why, if the gentleman and his colleagues are so interested, they have not appeared before the Committee on Appropriations pressing the Nelson resolution which proposes to make this appropriation?

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. We tried very hard on that measure.

Mr. JONES. May I suggest in this connection, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, that there is some considerable question as to whether the Appropriations Committee could act without specific authority and legislation. The situation is a little confused, because from time to time we have been making this appropriation and nobody has objected. The gentlemen who are interested in this matter are not to be criticized for not going before the Appropriations Committee when there was no particular and specific authorization.

It is just as much out of order for the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate without legislative authority. But we have been waiving that from year to year, and I think the gentleman from Georgia might very well waive it in this particular instance if we put in this amendment which the parliamentary clerk and the clerk of the committee think will cure the situation and require action by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. TARVER. While there may have been no specific authorization, yet the House has been making appropriations for these purposes for many years.

So far as the gentleman's amendment is concerned, what objection does the gentleman have to an amendment to the committee amendment simply striking out the language which actually makes the appropriation? The amendment the gentleman now proposes seems to me to put it in considerable doubt.

Mr. JONES. If the language to which the gentleman refers is struck out, there will be but $100,000 authorized. The amendment would enable them to make transfers of other appropriations and to authorize the Department to make them only upon action by the Appropriations Committee. It is subject to action by the Appropriations Committee. That is just as final as can be.

Mr. TARVER. That is another phase of objection, because the language to which I object authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture at his discretion to take funds appropriated for whatever purpose and use them for this purpose.

Mr. JONES. No. As modified by the amendment I am offering, they will be authorized to make transfers only as authorized by the Appropriations Committee. The action would be subject to authorization by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. TARVER. It seems to me that it is absolutely unnecessary to give to the Secretary of Agriculture any authority along that line. If authority is granted simply to make appropriations for these purposes, that ought to be sufficient.

Mr. JONES. I understand there is an unexpended balance available.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The way this proposed amendment is put into this bill there is absolutely no limitation on the amount that could be transferred in this current fiscal year out of funds that are appropriated for other purposes.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will yield right there, with the amendment, however, it would be subject to action by the Appropriations Committee; and no fund could be transferred except on specific authorization of the Appropriations Committee. This is simply an effort to get us out of this tangle for this year until we can get the necessary legislation. That is the sole purpose of the amendment; and I am offering an amendment which would require specific action by the Appropriations Committee before any money could be taken, either out of the $100,000 fund or any other fund.

Mr. TARVER. If that be the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, there could be no possible objection to striking out the entire language making the appropriation, because all of the other matters of which the gentleman speaks are within the jurisdiction of the Appropriations Committee anyway.

Mr. JONES. If that language were stricken out, not even the $100,000 would be available.

Mr. TARVER. Why not increase the amount of authorization to $5,000,000, as originally proposed by the Senate? I have no objection to the amount authorized.

Mr. JONES. The trouble is, if you authorize that amount, you do not have any assurance at all of getting approval. The matter must go through the Budget Bureau and the Budget Bureau has refused to sanction a $5,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. TARVER. Let the House appropriate whatever amount less than $5,000,000 it might find necessary. They would not have to appropriate $5,000,000.

Mr. JONES. It could not if the bill happened to be vetoed on the recommendation of the Budget Commission.

Mr. TARVER. Make it a million, then.

Mr. JONES. If that will satisfy these gentlemen, all right.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. I have reliable information from the farmers of the State of Montana to the effect even $300,000 would be of very little benefit to the people of that State. If this appropriation is cut to $100,000, it is absolutely insufficient to be of any consequence at all.

Mr. TARVER. The suggestion I made to my colleague was that the amount of the authorization be put at $1,000,000.

I have no objection, I may say to the gentleman from Montana, to the amount of the authorization. It may be made a million, two million, or five million, because the Appropriations Committee would undoubtedly recommend to the House for appropriation only as much as might be needed and not the maximum amount. What I am objecting to is the actual appropriation of money in a legislative bill, and I mean any sum of money, for that is a subject matter which properly comes before the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Here is the situation: These crickets and grasshoppers are now hatched. If this money is not made available it would require 10 times the amount later on that is required now to accomplish the same purpose.

Mr. TARVER. The fact remains that a bill making an appropriation is introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON], which has been referred to the Appropriations Committee. That bill has been pending in that committee for weeks. The Appropriations Committee has jurisdiction, and the gentleman and his colleagues who are interested in securing the passage of this appropriation might as well have appeared there and made their showing as to make it before a legislative committee which has no jurisdiction.

Mr. JONES. I do not think that is quite accurate, if the gentleman will permit. It is not a fair statement. The Appropriations Committee does not have jurisdiction unless there is legislative authority. The matter was taken up with that committee and we were advised by those who had investigated there was not authority. For this reason we are trying to make a correction by offering an amendment which will require action by the Appropriations Committee definitely before anything may be done.

Mr. TARVER. The language of the gentleman's amendment is somewhat indefinite.

Mr. COCHRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. May I say to the gentleman from Georgia that I have talked to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations who handles the agricultural bill, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who is greatly interested in this bill. His district, one of the outstanding agricultural districts in the country, is going to suffer a terrible loss if the bill does not pass. As the gentleman from Georgia says, Mr. CANNON is now presiding over the hearings on the agricultural appropriation bill, and for that reason alone he is not here to express his views. We have gone along faster this morning than any of us expected, but Mr. CANNON is now on his way to the Chamber, and if he gets here in time he will tell you why it is necessary to hurry this legislation and would appeal for the passage of the bill today. Year after year I voted for appropriations for this purpose when my State was not affected, but to assist farmers in other parts of the country. The grasshoppers and other pests are now in Missouri and that section of the country, and I repeat there is a bad situation existing. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] told me a minute ago he was in northern Missouri recently and can confirm this statement. Now, this is an emergency measure. This money is needed immediately, and if there is any delay we are liable to see a situation that will cost our farmers as much as the dry spell last year.

Mr. TARVER. I do not question the correctness of the statement made by the gentleman, although I am not informed. I have talked to the chairman of the subcommittee, and, according to his statement to me, he is in accord with the position I am now taking in reference to this legislation. I have no desire to be obstreperous at all about the matter. I have explained my views, and I am only one member of the Appropriations Committee. I feel that the proper procedure in this matter has not been adopted. In view of the discussion which has been had, by means of which the House has become fully apprised of the circumstances, I am going to withdraw my reservation of objection, and if no other Member of the House has any objection to the passage of the legislation in its present form, I shall not object myself.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the gentleman, and I hope no other gentleman will object, in view of the situation that confronts us.

The gentleman is always fair. His point is very well taken, and if he so desired he could raise a point of order that would be sustained. I am sure every Member of the House whose district is affected by the pests will appreciate the action of the gentleman from Georgia in permitting the bill to pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I note this is not only a temporary authorization but it is made permanent. The bill and the resolution as amended provides an appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for an appropriation in each fiscal year thereafter in the sum of $100,000.

Mr. JONES. That is a pure authorization. There is no objection to that feature. There is no question but that the committee has jurisdiction of that matter.

Mr. SABATH. But it is made permanent.

Mr. JONES. It is a permanent authorization for that amount.

Mr. SABATH. I remember when we authorized a certain amount for the packers many years ago it was claimed that was merely a temporary authorization, nevertheless year after year the sum of $3,000,000 has been appropriated based upon that authorization, and this money should have been paid by the packers themselves.

Mr. JONES. This is only for a hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SABATH. I know it is only for a hundred thousand dollars, but why is it necessary to make it permanent?

Mr. JONES. The grasshoppers themselves have not been altogether temporary in their operations. They have an unreasonable habit of coming back year after year.

Mr. SABATH. I realize that, but we have an Appropriations Committee and an Agricultural Committee, presided over by a very capable chairman.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SABATH. I know he has not omitted anything that is needed or required to aid agriculture and I know he will be here next session and all sessions thereafter as long as he desires. So why not bring it up then? There may not be any need for it in 1938 or 1939 or 1940, but if it is once authorized it will go through every year.

Mr. JONES. It would still require action by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. SABATH. I know, but an authorization in a majority of cases is tantamount to an appropriation.

Mr. JONES. We meet here in January. We always come up with this thing under whip and spur, because we do not know until the pest makes its appearance whether the fund will be necessary. If we have to come in and have legislation followed by an appropriation it will delay the matter very materially and the appropriation may not be available in time to secure the best results.

Mr. SABATH. I realize what delays mean. I have had some experience with some of my own bills.

Mr. JONES. I am sure the gentleman has.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman says it is needed and required, I am willing to withdraw my objection.

Mr. JONES. Let us allow this resolution to go through.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture if the language of this bill is broad enough and if it is contemplated that it shall include also the boll-weevil pest?

Mr. JONES. Yes. The list shown on the first page includes insect pests or plant diseases.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. The boll weevil is not a plant disease; it is an insect.

Mr. JONES. It is an insect pest. This resolution includes insect pests or plant diseases, and includes other pests specifically named, but the naming of some would not exclude the others, since the general term is also used.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Is the gentleman sure about that?

Mr. JONES. I feel confident that is true. I will state to the gentleman, however, we are trying to get up a list of these as to which there is any question about an authorization under existing law. We are trying to get some legislation for later action that will be comprehensive enough to cover the field.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Is it the intention of the gentleman to raise the amount authorized in this bill at the present time?

Mr. JONES. We would think at least there should be an authorization. This amount would not be sufficient if it were applied to the whole field.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will offer an amendment that will take care of the whole thing.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 75

Resolved, etc., That for the application of such methods of control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs, as, in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture, may be necessary, in cooperation with such authorities of the States concerned, organizations or individuals as the Secretary may deem necessary to accomplish such purposes, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing, rent outside of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, the sum of $5,000,000 is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be made immediately available and remain available until expended; and there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such additional sums as may be necessary to replenish the fund to its original amount at the beginning of each fiscal year: Provided, That such appropriations shall be administered by the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine and shall be used for expenditures of general administration and supervision, surveys, purchase, transportation, and application of poison baits or materials and equipment for control of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs, or for the preparation of such materials for application, and such other expenses as in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture may be deemed necessary: And provided further, That no part of such appropriations shall be used to pay the cost of value of farm animals, farm crops, or other property injured or destroyed.

With the following committee amendment:

Beginning on page 2, strike out all of lines 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "there is authorized to be appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for each fiscal year thereafter, the sum of $100,000. During the calendar year 1937 the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, is authorized to transfer from any appropriations available to the Secretary such sums as the Secretary deems necessary for the purposes of this resolution. Sums appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, in pursuance of this resolution, shall be available immediately and such sums, together with sums transferred in pursuance of this resolution, shall remain available until expended. Sums appropriated or transferred for the purposes of this resolution shall."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 13, after the word "authorized", insert "subject to the provisions of appropriations hereafter made by law."

On page 2, line 18, strike out "in pursuance" and insert "for the purposes."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

With the following further committee amendment:

Page 3, line 4, strike out, after the word "deemed", the remainder of line 4 and all of line 5 and insert "necessary. No part of such sums." In line 6, strike out the words "cost of" and insert "cost or."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a resolution adopted by the Bar Association of the State of Mississippi endorsing the President's plan for reorganization of the Federal judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me in the granting of this request we are establishing a precedent. I am sure many of us would like to know what the policy of the majority leadership is going to be from now on with respect to putting into the RECORD these petitions and letters with respect to the President's proposal regarding the Supreme Court. I do not think it should be incumbent upon us to object, but I am sure if this unanimous-consent request goes through without objection by the majority leadership we will interpret it to mean that the doors are open, and we will bring our letters here and ask unanimous consent that they be put in the RECORD.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, may I say to the gentleman from Michigan this is not a letter. It is a short resolution adopted by the bar association of my State.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let me say to the gentleman that I have in my office resolutions adopted by the bar associations of almost every county in Michigan, 83 of them, also resolutions by the bar associations of many States.

Mr. RANKIN. I have no objection to the gentleman from Michigan putting into the RECORD any resolution adopted by the bar association of his own State.

Mr. WALCOTT. Can the gentleman assure us that there will be no objection by the majority leadership in that respect?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a speech of Secretary of the Interior Ickes, delivered in North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE CONSENT CALENDAR

PENSIONS TO CERTAIN SOLDIERS, SAILORS, AND NURSES OF THE SPANISH WAR, THE PHILIPPINE INSURRECTION, AND THE CHINA RELIEF EXPEDITION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5030, granting pensions and increases of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and nurses of the War with Spain, the Philippine Insurrection, or the China Relief Expedition, and for other purposes.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

INSURANCE OF REHABILITATION LOANS BY THE FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1228, to amend the National Housing Act.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have this bill explained. What is the situation that requires this measure to go through on the Consent Calendar?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, The bill would extend an act that was passed on April 17, 1936, amendatory of title 1 of the original Housing Act, so as to permit the insurance of loans made for rehabilitation purposes as a result of floods and other catastrophes that occurred in 1935 and 1936, and which was operative to the 1st of January 1937. The purpose of the extension is to provide for insurance of loans of this type to cover sufferers from disasters that have taken place since the 1st of January 1937, as well as prior to that time. The bill has the unanimous support of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and has been passed by the Senate. It is a part of the flood-relief plans upon which the House voted when we passed the bill authorizing loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for purposes of rehabilitation in connection with damages resulting from recent disasters.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEAGALL. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. How much longer does this extend the time?

Mr. STEAGALL. The time is extended for 2 years.

Mr. SNELL. Is it necessary to extend it to 1939 in order to take care of the flood conditions that already exist?

Mr. STEAGALL. Possibly not; but it seems to me that is a proper matter to be left to administration. There might arise cases where a shorter period would work hardships.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, having in mind this year, practically all of the loans would come to the front during the year, would they not?

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, I would think so.

Mr. SNELL. Then why do you need to extend it another year?

Mr. STEAGALL. The Senate passed the bill in that form——

Mr. SNELL. I understand that, but I should like to know the reason for it.

Mr. STEAGALL. There is no mandatory necessity for this particular date, but it seemed to the committee that the Senate provision is a very reasonable way of meeting the necessities of the situation.

Mr. SNELL. Just because another body extended the act until 1939, with no reason given us, seems to me a rather poor excuse for our agreeing to it.

Mr. STEAGALL. Loans might not all be made within 6 months or 1 year. There may be temporary loans and new loans made covering former transactions.

If the gentleman is familiar with what has been done heretofore with respect to the insurance of loans of this type, as well as the broader field covered by title 1, I do not think he would be apprehensive of any great blunder in allowing this additional time.

Mr. SNELL. Does this extend all of title I?

Mr. STEAGALL. This bill does not. This relates only to loans made for rehabilitation purposes to relieve distress that has resulted from disasters.

Mr. SNELL. How many loans have been made under this act so far?

Mr. STEAGALL. I cannot give the gentleman the figures, but it is only a small amount. The R. F. C. had a fund of $50,000,000 for loans of this type, and I think they made loans amounting to about $8,000,000. I cannot say just what loans were made of the kind that could be insured under this bill.

Mr. SNELL. How much has been paid back?

Mr. STEAGALL. I have not those figures.

Mr. SNELL. I notice this goes back to 1935. Is it necessary to go back to 1935 on these loans now?

Mr. STEAGALL. This bill simply amends the act that was passed in April of last year which dealt with the distress resulting from disasters in 1935 and 1936. This is simply an extension of that act with a provision to take care of new developments.

Mr. SNELL. The whole thing seems to be rather uncertain, with very little definite information available. I am willing to do whatever is necessary, but I do think we ought to have a definite proposition before us and we should know exactly what we are doing.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is impossible to know just exactly what loans would be insured under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman to say we are practically doing this because it was passed by another body in this form. It seems to me we do not have any very definite information about it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. There are several controversial questions involved in this bill. I had no intention of objecting to the bill, but I did want to offer some amendments. It seems to me that because of the controversies we should take this up under the rules of the House and have some time for debate. Permit me to point out to the chairman of the committee some of the controversies. The first is that we anticipate catastrophes in 1938 and 1939 and provide for the insurance of loans attending those disasters. The next is that we depart somewhat from the present practice, inasmuch as we insure 20 percent of the total of the loans, although it is generally understood that the entire amount of all of the loans by banks, trust companies, and so forth, shall be insured. It is a matter of record, according to the testimony of the Chairman, Mr. McDonald, and I believe also of Mr. Ferguson, the General Counsel of the Housing Administration, that the interest charged on these loans is 9.72 percent, almost 10 percent, which would be usury in many of the States of the Union. It was my intention to offer an amendment that no loan should be insured if it bears a higher rate of interest than 7 percent. We have already set up machinery in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for loans for flood relief, and the big fellow can go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and get a loan and has to pay only 3 percent on it, and here we are penalizing the home owners in these flood-devastated regions by compelling them to pay 9.72 percent on these loans, and so, to make this a real relief measure, I had another amendment to restrict the privileges to loans under $25,000.

Because of that I hope the gentleman will not object to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that the bill go over without prejudice, in order that we may take it up on Calendar Wednesday or some other time and thoroughly discuss the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. But this is not a bill providing for loans. It is a bill designed to induce loans through regular channels by offering insurance on those loans, and that being the case, the matter of interest and detail of that kind could not very well or constructively be dealt with in this act. That would have to be left to administration, and any arbitrary rule about it would only restrict the benefits that could be derived from the legislation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, the banks and trust companies have told us virtually that they would not loan to these poor people in these flood-devastated areas unless they got their 9.72 interest, but this is a bill primarily to give relief, not to the trust companies and banks of the Mississippi and Ohio Valleys, but to the poor people down there who have been washed out. With excess reserves of over $3,000,000,000 resulting from the fact that there is not a normal demand for bank credit, a condition which compelled the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve to raise reserve requirements and freeze all but $500,000,000 of them to prevent inflation, I should think that the banks are so full of money they should be anxious to get loans at even 5 percent, especially because they are fully insured.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This is a very important piece of legislation, it strikes me, and on each side it is contended that this is going to be of benefit to those who suffered in the recent floods. There is no one in the House who represents a district that suffered more than mine, but if this bill provides for the loaning of money at 9 percent, that will not help us and we do not want it. That will not give us any relief. What we want is something that will help our people to rehabilitate themselves.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Reserving the right further to object, if this bill does any good to the people in the flooded territory, then I shall not object to its being passed over without preiudice or to its passage. In fact, I will be strong for it; but I think we ought to have enough time to know whether this does us any good. If it is a bill for the benefit of some one group except flood sufferers, then we do not want it to run under the false title of a flood-relief bill. Let it run on its own steam. Nine-percent money is not the kind of money my people want.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman understands that this is not a bill providing loans at 9 percent. It has nothing to do with loans, except that we propose to insure them in order to induce people to make loans in the regular way to people in distress.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If they are going to charge 9 percent, we do not want them.

Mr. STEAGALL. That has nothing to do with this.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, the testimony before our committee is to the effect that, with the initial discount and the interest charged on these loans which have already been made to the sufferers in the 1936 catastrophe, they are paying an average of 9.72-percent interest. That is a matter of record; it is a matter of fact that these people are not going to get any relief from trust companies and banks in these areas, who want their loans insured unless they pay them the going rate of interest, which on this character of loan is 9.72 percent, according to the testimony of the man who has made it a matter of study for the last 6 months.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It has been brought out that the $50,000,000 loaned last year was loaned through the Federal Housing Administration. It was through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Federal Housing had nothing to do with that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. There was a sum of $50,000,000 set up for this purpose. In the act which we passed last month we provided that they could use $20,000,000 of this to make loans in flood-devastated areas, but there the rate of interest is 3 percent.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; that is correct. All of us from the flood areas took an active part in procuring its passage. That has nothing to do with this bill, though, as I understand. That $50,000,000 is in a different bill entirely. Only $8,000,000 of it was loaned. Most of that was loaned to the people in the Pennsylvania flood areas.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The difference is that on loans made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation they have to put up security. Loans made under this act are known as character loans, and if your record is all right, you may get a loan, regardless of security.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I do not know what this proposed legislation will do, and so far as I have heard in this discussion, nobody knows. I do know what the Disaster Loan Corporation Act does. Will the gentleman say that if his amendment is permitted reducing this rate of interest to 7 percent, that the bill then will be of benefit to the people in the flood area? If it is, we want it, although I do not see how 7-percent money will help us much unless it is to be loaned without any security and without much hope for its immediate repayment.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It will be of benefit if the banks will make loans at 7 percent; yes. My contention is that with so many excess reserves the rate of interest should be reduced. The banks, I believe, should be willing to loan to private individuals, both character loans and secured loans, rather than be compelled to invest in Government obligations on which they only make 2⅛ or 2¼ percent.

Mr. STEAGALL. Does the gentleman undertake to say that these people are able to obtain all the relief they need without this legislation or without any further assistance?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I do not think you should club these people into the banks down there and compel them to pay usurious rates of interest in opposition to the laws of their State. This is taking an unfair advantage of the situation; it is kicking a man when he is down. You should not want it. I do not want it. None of us should want it. We want to give relief. We do not want to be parties to usurious practices.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does this apply to any loans except loans to those people who already have a loan through the Federal Housing Administration?

Mr. WOLCOTT. This applies to any new loans for any catastrophe where a bank or trust company qualifies under the Federal Housing Administration to have their loans secured. The Federal Housing Administration insures these loans—not 10 percent of each loan, but 10 percent on the aggregate which the bank or trust company loans. So it gives 100-percent insurance up to the point that the loss by the bank is under 10 percent of the aggregate.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. RAYBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan this question: I may be entirely incorrect, but my understanding is that this bill has nothing whatever to do with the rate charged for the loan. It is simply an extension of the privilege to other people. Now, it appears to me if that is the case, if there is any possibility of any people in the flood districts being helped by passing this bill, we are at least that far ahead; whereas if we do nothing, there is no chance.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I might say to the gentleman that I do not believe a majority of this Congress, when this bill was passed last year, would have ever voted "aye" to a set-up which is just bleeding those poor people down there through usury. Just because we made a mistake last year with respect to the sufferers in 1936, I do not see why this Congress should be made a party to a continuance of that practice. We now have an opportunity, with the mistakes of the past year before us, to establish a policy with respect to the catastrophes of this year and next year and 1939. We should not become a party to, in the vernacular, gypping these poor souls down there who are trying to get back on their feet. We should try to encourage them. We should not bleed them because they are down and out.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. Would the gentleman be willing to let this bill pass if it was agreed to accept the amendment offered by him limiting the interest to 7 percent?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have no objection to the bill if my amendment is adopted. I am in favor of it. I had no intention of objecting to the bill. I was going to offer the amendment, and if I could not convince the House that it was a sound amendment, I would expect the majority of them to vote against it; but because of the controversy which has arisen here, I think we should have more time to discuss it. I think we should have at least an hour of debate and then read it under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. COCHRAN. Is it the gentleman's contention that the bill is so worded that it will permit the banks in this area to charge 9.72 percent unless there is a restriction in the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. These loans made under this bill, if it is passed, are going to be made at 9.72 percent unless we restrict the amount of interest, because it has been done for the past year.

Mr. COCHRAN. I think the House ought to be in full agreement with the gentleman—that we should limit the rate to 7 percent.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The other day we passed a bill providing for character loans. As I recall, the explanation was——

Mr. THOMPSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Do I understand that the question was on the unanimous-consent request submitted by the gentleman from New York that the bill go over without prejudice?

The SPEAKER. That was the parliamentary question pending.

The question now is, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, if we cannot discuss it, I object.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN CONTRACTORS ON MISSISSIPPI RIVER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2565, to confer jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and enter judgment upon the claims of contractors for excess costs incurred while constructing navigation dams and locks on the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. I object.

PENALIZING PROCURING ESCAPE OF PRISONERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4012, to penalize procuring of or attempts to procure the escape of any prisoner in the custody of an officer of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 10 of the act of May 14, 1930 (46 Stat. 327; U. S. C., title 18, sec. 753i), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 10. It shall be unlawful for any person to procure the escape of any prisoner committed to the custody of the Attorney General or his authorized representative, or who is confined in any penal or correctional institution pursuant to the direction of the Attorney General, or who is in custody by virtue of any process issued under the laws of the United States by any court, judge, or commissioner, or who is in custody of an officer of the United States pursuant to lawful arrest or detention; and it shall likewise be unlawful to advise, connive at, aid, assist, or attempt to procure the escape of any such prisoner so confined or in custody, or to conceal any such prisoner after such escape. If the custody or confinement of the prisoner whose escape is procured, advised, connived at, aided, assisted, attempted, or concealed is by virtue of an arrest on a charge of a felony, or conviction of any offense whatever, the offense herein defined shall constitute a felony and any person convicted thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 5 years or by a fine of not more than $5,000, or both; and if the custody or confinement of the prisoner whose escape is procured, advised, connived at, aided, assisted, attempted, or concealed is by virtue of an arrest or charge of or for a misdemeanor, and prior to conviction, the offense herein defined shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 1 year or by a fine of not more than $1,000, or both."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ALLOTMENT OF PAY BY CIVILIAN PERSONNEL STATIONED ABROAD

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5332, authorizing allotment of pay by civilian personnel stationed abroad.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the author of the bill explain the bill?

Mr. COCHRAN. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. Speaker, the President sent a message to the House together with a letter from the Secretary of State regarding employees of the State Department having relatives in this country to whom they desire to allot part of their salary. The Secretary of State requests Congress to pass this legislation so that employees of the State Department in foreign countries, say, for instance, China, can authorize the Department to send so much a month of his or her salary to relatives instead of requiring the money first be sent to China, the employee then sending it back to his relatives.

The report states and Secretary Hull's letter indicates that it will not cost the Government a cent. It is to assist in helping people in this country who are dependents of Government employees abroad to get money on which to live without waiting for weeks or months to receive it.

Mr. BEITER. I cannot understand the report from the Department saying it will not cost the Government anything additional. If you split a voucher or a check it costs money. How many people are employed in foreign countries whose vouchers would have to be split this way?

Mr. COCHRAN. I repeat, the Secretary of State says that it will not cost the Government any additional money, and I am accepting his word, and the committee accepted his word. I do not know how many desire to allot part of their earnings, but we do it for the officer and enlisted personnel of the Army and the Navy, and have been for years. We have been doing it likewise for the Coast Guard and the Marine Corps. If we can do it for the Army and the Navy and other departments, why not do it for the employees of the State Department?

Mr. BEITER. I quite agree with the gentleman, but I was wondering what expense was involved. It certainly will cost something.

Mr. COCHRAN. I am telling the gentleman, the Secretary of State says it will cost nothing, and I am accepting his views, because he is the one who will handle the allotments when they are made. We are not authorizing any appropriation, and therefore an appropriation for this purpose would be subject to a point of order if it is requested. I will join the gentleman in opposing an appropriation if it is carried in an appropriation bill because of the statement of the Secretary of State, who assures us it will not cost any additional money to handle the accounts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the heads of the executive departments and establishments of the United States, under such regulations as they may prescribe, be, and are hereby, authorized to permit civilian officers and employees, during such time as they may be assigned for duty outside the continental limits of the United States, to make allotments, in whole or in part, from their pay, for the support of their families or relatives, for their own savings, or for other similar purposes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes following the disposition of the other special orders for the day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes this afternoon following the disposition of the special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Delegate from Hawaii?

There was no objection.

ARMY DAY

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 5, now on the Speaker's table.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That April 6 of each year be recognized by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America as Army Day, and that the President of the United States be requested, as Commander in Chief, to order military units throughout the United States to assist civic bodies in appropriate celebration to such extent as he may deem advisable; to issue a proclamation each year declaring April 6 as Army Day, and in such proclamations to invite the Governors of the various States to issue Army Day proclamations: Provided, That in the event April 6 falls on Sunday, the following Monday shall be recognized as Army Day.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman from Alabama should make an explanation of this resolution, because of its rather far-reaching potentialities.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is merely a concurrent resolution and, if passed by the House, will not have the effect of law. What it does is to have the House and Senate recognize April 6, which the gentleman knows is the anniversary of our entrance into the World War, as Army Day. The resolution further requests the President, as Commander in Chief, to allow units of the Army to cooperate with civilian organizations in patriotic exercises on that day, this cooperation being entirely in the discretion of the President. It asks the President to issue a proclamation declaring April 6 as Army Day, and inviting Governors to do likewise. It does not create a national holiday.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know what influences are back of this resolution—whether it is eventually intended, after we recognize the day formally, to try to make it a national holiday?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Those who inspired the resolution are members of the Military Order of the World War, a veterans' organization, composed of veterans of the World War. They tell me they do not have any such intention.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know whether the next step will be requests for certain appropriations?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Oh, no; there is no money or appropriation involved.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman is sure there is no intention to try to make this a national holiday?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. There is no such intention that I know of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the Navy observe a comparable day?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. They observe the birthday of Theodore Roosevelt as Navy Day.

Mr. THURSTON. Is that authorized, or does it have the same standing as this proposal?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I do not know exactly what brought Navy Day into being. I do know they celebrate Theodore Roosevelt's birthday, which is the 29th of October, as Navy Day, and there is a proclamation issued.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman attribute this request to a desire to arouse national pride in our Army? Is that one of the reasons for this resolution?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman is correct. Let me say in this connection I believe we all realize that perhaps one of the least duties of the Army is the duty of fighting. It is a great agency of service in peacetime emergencies. We have just had an illustration of what the Army, a trained body of men, means to the Nation in connection with the work that these men did in the service rendered by them in the flood area in the recent catastrophe in the Ohio Valley.

Mr. GIFFORD. Is it anticipated that this will be the same as Navy Day? That is, we will be requested to intervene to get some vessel from the Navy on an allotted day? Will we have to have the members of an Army post sent out to various places to create this feeling of pride?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think the gentleman need not have any apprehensions along that line

Mr. GIFFORD. Why would it not be just as applicable to have the Army sent somewhere, the same as we send the ships of the Navy to various places? There must be some reason for this resolution.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. This resolution, as I have stated previously, is inspired by a splendid veterans' organization, the Military Order of the World War. For 10 years they have been celebrating this day as Army Day and for several years the Congress has passed a somewhat similar resolution to this.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is what I wanted the gentleman to say.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I may say that in the past there has been nothing to indicate what the gentleman suggests.

Mr. GIFFORD. It is a matter of trying to bring to the attention of the people this particular day, not so much as a day for the Army to celebrate.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did I understand the gentleman to say a comparable resolution to this is passed every year?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. I said a somewhat similar resolution had been passed each year. For instance, last year we passed a resolution, and for several years the Congress has passed a resolution, recognizing April 6, the anniversary of our entrance into the World War, as Army Day.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know more about this resolution. I have not had the time to study it over.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Has the gentleman any questions?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know enough about it to ask questions.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I stated the purport of the resolution. It simply provides for recognizing this day as Army Day, but does not establish it or set it aside as a national holiday. The resolution simply asks the President of the United States in his discretion to permit Army units to join with patriotic societies in celebrating this particular day. Many patriotic societies, particularly those composed of veterans of the World War, hold some sort of celebration on this day. For instance, in the State of Michigan the great city of Detroit will have a big celebration on this day this year. There is to be one also in New York and other places throughout the country. This resolution would not have the effect of law at all.

Mr. SCOTT. Does this make April 6 each year Army Day? Does it make it a perpetual thing from now on, or just for this year?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. So far as this resolution is concerned, it would recognize April 6 of each year as Army Day, but it does not have the effect of law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 1096. An act for the relief of Michael E. Sullivan.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, man is governed by three basic instincts; first, that of self-preservation or the will to live; second, self-perpetuation or the will to love; and, third, self-expansion or the will to possess more. The third instinct, which is the will to more, is characteristic of man only. Animals, not being conscious of the future, and satisfied with what they have for the moment, are possessed of the first two instincts, but have no will to more. Only man wants more than he needs.

The world of man has been made possible by the threefold extension of his personality; first, by his physical or biological extension, which resulted in the establishment of civilization; second, by the expansion of his mind, which resulted in the establishment of culture; and third, by the expansion of his will which created for him, his social, economic, and political fabric. The basic difference between man and animal is that the former has the ability to create tools, while the latter has not. Animals do not make tools. Man's tool-making ability is a compensation for his natural weakness. He is the weakest of all higher animals, not only as far as his senses, but as far as his limbs are concerned. The bull moose has a greater audibility and the eagle a greater visibility than man. The reindeer and the ostrich can outrun him just as fish can outswim him. Finally, man is earthbound because of the lack of wings, and is helpless in the struggle with higher animals because of his weak hands. However, by his tool-making skill, and by his ability to create implements, instruments, and apparatus he can not only overcome the higher animal but he can perform functions for which nature has not equipped him.

Through the development of transportation he extended his legs. Through the perfection of radio and telephone he has extended his ears. Through the invention of the microscope and telescope he has extended his vision. Through the development of shipping he can outswim any fish, and through the creation of aviation he has, so to speak, grafted wings upon himself, and can outfly any bird. In short, through the extension of all the five senses—hearing, seeing, feeling, tasting, and smelling—he has been enabled to outgrow his actual physique and matters of nature. The extension of the five senses, through the perfection of tools, machinery, and equipment, has resulted in the creation of civilization. To retain his impressions of nature he created art; to prolong his memory he invented writing and printing; to find his way in nature he created principles of mathematics and science. Culture is thus an extension of the mind, as civilization is an extension of the body. The expansion of his will, to the will to possess more, which is one of the sources of his economic creativeness, is a double-edged sword in the struggle for his existence. This uncurbed expansion of the will, to the will to possess more, resulting in the vast accumulation of wealth by individuals, is the cause of all wars, rebellion, revolutions, and other economic upheavals. The will to possess more is thus one of the sources of man's brutality and cruelty, and is more powerful and more unyielding than the will to life, or the will to perpetuate oneself, because this will to more draws from two sources—the physical and the spiritual.

The will to more draws from man's vision, from his consciousness of the future, from his gift for abstractions, as well as from his physical will. Hence the phenomenon that rich men who lose their fortune, or part of their fortune, commit suicide, although they are still very far from the poorhouse. To preserve his wealth man would transgress all boundaries of law and decency, and resort to means which are degrading and debasing. It is for this reason that all forces of the spirit have united to curb the will to more. Religion, politics, ethics, the law, and the state are vying with one another to limit the sphere of that will. For the sake of its own existence the State must curb the will to more of the individual or of a group of individuals. The law by delimiting this sphere of the right of the individual is already curbing the will to possess more. All postulates of social justice arise out of a vehement negative attitude to the will to more. All true ethics teaches man not to exploit his fellow men, and tries to impose limitations upon his will to more. The basic religious document of civilized humanity, the Decalogue, is dedicated to the delimiting and curbing of the will to more. Without these forces trying to bend and control the will to more, the life of man would differ but little from that of the jungle, and man would reduce his fellow men to a beast of burden or to a part of nature. In the jungle the rule of unregulated freedom prevails. Animals can roam as they please and move about unhindered. It is the perfect order of laissez faire. The result is that the mighty devour the weak, and its order of life is might makes right. Instinctive brute force rules. This jungle rule when applied to human society manifests itself in two forms: First, in the unregulated freedom of the laissez faire, an order in which the economically powerful may devour the economically weak; or, second, when the king of the jungle has imposed his will upon the other creatures and made himself dictator, thus regulating the rule of force. This regulated rule of force of the jungle when applied to organized society is fascism—either right or left fascism. In the fascist state, like in the jungle, when the lion or the tiger asserts his will, the dictator imposes his will upon his fellow men without regard to their desire, wishes, ideas, or welfare. If jungle chaos is laissez faire, jungle order in the state is dictatorship.

There could possibly be no objection to either the laissez faire order of things, or to the dictatorship, if man were only a part of nature and nothing more than the tiger, lion, or any other ferocious animal. But man is more than a part of nature; he stands on the threshold of two worlds, the physical and the spiritual. He is a citizen of both, and governed by both. Such is not only the dictum of all true religions and philosophy, particularly of Biblical religion, in which man appears as the crown of creation, and is God's main care and concern, but it is the dictum of our own experience of our own recognition. If man were only a part of nature, he would be as unproductive as the animal. Animals have no mathematics, have no science, have no religion, have no law, have no ethics, because they are not spiritual beings. These creations of the spirit could only emanate from spiritual beings, consequently man cannot be said to be just a part of nature, and entitled to the same rule as the jungle. The law by which he lives must be a human law and not a jungle law.

No other spiritual force in history has dedicated itself to a greater and more bitter struggle against the will to more, than the two Biblical religions, Judaism and Christianity. These two religions are anthropocentric in character, visualizing man as a center of all things, and as a most important phenomenon in the universe. In these two religions, man appears as the crown of creation, as the object of God's interest and care. God is not interested in oxen or sheep, in tigers or in leopards, he is interested in man exclusively, because man alone has the spark of the Divine spirit. God, the source of all goodness, wants man to be good, and His greatest message to man is: To be good, to be just, to be righteous to his fellow men. This anthropocentric world concept spells human rights. All other religions of antiquity have been cosmocentric or naturalistic in one form or another, and have either belittled the importance of man, as was the case in Brahmanism or Buddhism. Or they have taken an indifferent attitude to him, as was the case with the religions of classical antiquity. The negative attitude to man in the East has resulted in the caste system culminating in the establishment of untouchability, which is only an application of the jungle rule, that might makes right. The indifferent attitude to man in the West has resulted in slavery. If man is not the most important phenomenon in the cosmos and is only a part of nature, he must be subject to nature's rule exclusively, and nature's rule is jungle rule in one form or another. This cosmocentric world picture spells property rights. Both untouchability and slavery are forms of jungle rule. What a depraving force slavery is we all know. It was only recently abolished in this country. But what untouchability signifies, as a system of cruelty to man, you may guess from the fact that the untouchable is not permitted to drink water from the spring, but must drink it from the sewer. The spiritual father of fascism in the western world, Freidrich Nietzsche, in singing the praise of his superman, tacitly approves the law governing the untouchables. The rule of might makes right, is a direct result of the cosmocentric world picture with its universalism, pessimism, defeatism, and fatalism. In cosmocentric philosophy there is no hope for man as a spiritual being. Man is just a part of nature's fabric, and must be governed not only by its laws, but also by its rules and whims. The cosmocentric theory of life says, nature first and man afterward, because he is only an insignificant part of nature. The right of nature precedes the right of man. Property being dead, nature precedes human rights.

Nature is composed of four parts: Inanimate nature, which is dead nature, our mother earth. In its bowels it contains gold, silver, platinum, copper, iron, oil, coal, and so forth. It represents our natural resources. It stands for material wealth, property rights. Second, vegetation, plant and flower nature, which is poetic nature. Third, the birds that fly in the air, their melodious and mellifluous songs pealing from their throats, which is idyllic and lyric nature. And fourth, jungle nature, which is animal nature. Here the strong eat the weak. Might is right. Instinctive brute force rules. The classical order is laissez faire—leave everything alone.

It was against these sinister forces and doctrines of man's position in jungle nature that Biblical religiosity with its lofty anthropocentric world concept arose in rebellion and proclaimed the doctrine of the holiness and the dignity of man, of his spirituality, and of his special position in the cosmos. It proclaimed in the doctrine that man as a spiritual being can never be a means to an end, but an end in himself, and must not be exploited or oppressed. Thus it preached the gospel that human rights precede property rights. It proclaimed the doctrine that all men are equal before God because He created them all. He is their common Father and Judge. It proclaimed the doctrine that man is equal before the law and before the State, just as he is equal before God. It was out of this religious democracy that political and juridic democracy grew. The equality of all men before God, before the law, and before the State, and the right of all men to life, liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness is not compatible with either social, political, or economic oppression. [Applause.]

The two Biblical religions make man so important that in the Old Testament—Exodus, 32—Moses causes God to change His will and decree, and in the New Testament the Son of Man, Jesus, becomes the Son of God. The New Testament, far from being a denial of the Old, only magnifies and intensifies the doctrine of the Old Testament with respect to man. Whatever the theological difference of both religions, they agree upon the basic doctrine—that man, being the most important phenomenon in the universe, is not a part of nature only, and that his mission on earth is to walk the path of truth, righteousness, and justice, and thus make the attributes of God his guide in life.

The Son of Man, who became the Son of God, is the Redeemer, the Messiah, the harbinger of hope, and the great comforter. He is opposed by the figure of Caesar. Caesar spells despotism, cruelty, cheapening of human life, human degradation, and the reducing of man as a means to an end. It is surely no coincidence that Christianity arose at the time when Roman Caesarism was running wild, transforming the world of man into a valley of tears, attempting to perpetuate misery and suffering, and making human life almost meaningless. There is no more dramatic meeting in all the world's history than that of Pilate and Jesus. In that fateful meeting where the Savior said to Pilate, "Give unto Caesar that which belongs to Caesar, and give unto God that which belongs to God", the struggle of anthropocentricism, or human rights, challenged cosmocentricism, or property rights. Caesarism and Messianism faced each other and announced their determination to oppose one another for all future days until a day after eternity. Pilate, speaking for Roman Caesar, represented materialism, brute force, totalitarianism, dictatorship, and property rights. Jesus, speaking for the Spirit, represented goodness, justice, liberty, freedom, and human rights. This struggle between Caesarism and Messianism is now going on the world over. [Applause.]

If Biblical religiosity, dedicated to a life and death struggle against the will to possess more, has partly failed in its mission, it is primarily due to the medieval church, which, instead of continuing to fight Caesarism and all that it stood for, has made peace with him, and also to the fact that medieval Christianity has made peace with the diluted Hellenism and succumbed to the spirit of ancient Rome long after physical Rome was destroyed. As a result of these developments, the medieval church, instead of fighting the will to possess more, became itself the very embodiment of that will, for it attempted to hold both powers spiritual and temporal. To do so it had to ally itself with sinister forces, to make all sorts of political deals, which, as a rule, are not compatible with true religion. But after centuries of medieval darkness, western humanity found its way back to the original sources of religion and culture through the Reformation and the Renaissance.

With the rediscovery of the Bible, through the Reformation and its translation into German and English, and through the rediscovery of Socrates and Plato by the Renaissance, man was rediscovered. In the dark Middle Ages, man—I mean individual man—meant nothing. He had no rights, he had no claims, he had no dignity, nor any aspirations, ideals, or visions. For almost 1,000 years, from the destruction of Rome up to the Reformation and the Renaissance, man vanished completely from the picture. He reappears again with these two great world historic movements. Jacob Burkhart, the greatest historian of the Italian Renaissance, states that its greatest deed was the rediscovery of man, as a spiritual being, and as a world unto himself. This rediscovery resulted in the new plastic art that was dedicated to man exclusively. The great Dante appeared with his powerful Divine Comedy, Petrarch, Bocaccio, and the magnificient sculptors and painters of the Renaissance, Leonardo Da Vinci, Michael Angelo, Raphael. They painted human figures in contradistinction to the artists of the Orient, who had produced still nature. In the Orient, where human life is cheap and valueless, there is no art with man as a center. But the art of the Renaissance is exclusively human, because man occupies the center of the stage. The Protestant Reformation, too, has rediscovered man. Martin Luther is the first great religious figure in the Germanic world who is concerned with man, and who is worried about the individual and the individual soul. This is also true of Melanchton and Swingli, Erasmus, Kant, Goethe, Beethoven. This era of enlightenment brought forth such great intellectual geniuses as Galileo, Copernicus, Keppler, Newton, Leibnitz, and Spinoza, who thought in terms of mathematical formula and developed the sciences of mathematics, physics, algebra, geometry, that paved the way for the development and perfection of the machine age by fertilizing the soil of invention, a century later. In England the beginning of the Reformation actually coincides with the Magna Carta, the first primitive document to deal with the rights of man. And at the height of the Reformation in England the famous English Poor Law was enacted, providing for the economic relief of those in distress and need. Western history since the Reformation and the Renaissance, is a history of one uninterrupted struggle, of all forces of the spirit against the will to more. It is a history of the social, political, and economic emancipation of man. At times this process was interrupted by certain reactions, but still it went on, after overcoming these reactions—often in a more lively tempo.

Humanism, or the rights of man, is the name of the great cultural movement given by history to the anthropocentric tendencies which developed in the western world since the Reformation and the Renaissance. With the rise of humanism there developed new tendencies in jurisprudence, economics, and politics, and culminated later in the phenomenon called enlightment, which dominated the entire eighteenth century. But man as a source of all certainty, of all intellectual authority, and as a source of everything in philosophy, science, and other branches of culture, was established in the French Renaissance by the brilliant philosopher Descartes, who has summed up the greatest philosophic truth of all times: "I think, hence I am." Thus making human thought the source of all positive knowledge. There is a direct development from Descartes to the enlightment movement of the eighteenth century with his gospel of the rights of man. All the trends, currents, and ideas of that movement have had but one objective and one goal, to emancipate man from the shackles of political, economical, social, juridical, and ecclesiastical despotism. The real significance against the struggle of the so-called Popery in England was a rebellion against ancient Rome, expressing itself in despotism, autocracy, and political absolutism, and its will to possess more, with which the medieval church was permeated.

Most modern historians agree that one of the main causes of the French Revolution was the prevalence of ancient Roman law in France, with its attending cruelties, brutalities, and barbarism. The powerful attempts made to emancipate man, socially, economically, and politically, led to the actual dissolution of legitimism—the king's rule by the grace of God. Under legitimism, the country was considered the personal estate of the king, and not the property of the nation. The king was identical with the state and not the nation. Louis XIV expressed it in the formula "L'état c'est moi"—"I am the State." Republicanism as a form of government, and its corollary, democracy and all that goes with it, are the direct results of the humanistic movement, in the last few hundred years.

The political emancipation of man stimulated by such eminent anthropocentric scholars who loved their fellow man, as Montesquieu, who fought for parliamentary constitutional government in France, Rousseau, who in his great book Social Contract destroyed the principles upon which the divine right of kings existed, and battled for the sovereign right of the people to choose their representatives. Voltaire who pilloried and excoriated the cosmocentricism of the church instead of battling for human rights, aided and abetted later by the great American patriots and pioneers who fought for human rights, as Thomas Jefferson, Thomas Payne, Benjamin Franklin, James Madison, and George Washington. These men brought about the French and American revolutions, which overthrew feudalism and legitimism, and cleared the way for republican and democratic government, thereby necessitating an economic reorientation which found its expression in many new schools of economic thought in France, England, Germany, and America. They finally culminated in the one or the other forms of socialism. All these new schools of economic thought stressed economic democracy versus plutocracy, and man's rights versus property rights. If living man and not dead nature is the center of things in life, the conclusion is inescapable, that human rights must precede property rights; in short, that living man has more rights than dead nature. [Applause.]

When feudalism and legitimism were destroyed by the mighty revolutions at the end of the eighteenth century and agricultural slavery was abolished, the western world was about to experience the economic ideal of the Bible, "everybody in his own vineyard", for the enslaving feudal law was no more. But no sooner was feudalism overthrown and agricultural slavery ended than the machine age began and introduced industrial slavery. By the time feudalism as a primary economic force was destroyed, the villager was so impoverished that the city, with its industrial opportunities, looked to him like the promised land, and he soon exchanged it for the factory. The landed gentry was unable to halt this process because it could not answer the challenge of the new rising economic force, called capitalism, which ultimately developed into industrial plutocracy. The factory offered a full year's work, while the farm only offered 6 months' employment. For this reason the factory in the city attracted the farmer with a magnetic force and within a short time the entire landscape underwent a radical change. Innumerable villages were deserted and the city slum was born. This process is best described in Oliver Goldsmith's famous poem, The Deserted Village—"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills the prey, where wealth accumulates and men decay." In the city the farmer found, not the promised land, but the unexpected slum. Escaping starvation and misery in the village, he found slavery and squalor in the city. How this new slavery affected the life of the people, the life of the masses, can clearly be seen from the child-labor bill introduced in the English Parliament in 1815 by Robert Owen.

The bill was to forbid completely employment of children under 10 in textile factories and to allow no more than 10½ hours of work for anyone under the age of 18. The bill was considered revolutionary. The then master of the political destinies in England—Peel—who was himself a manufacturer, caused it to be postponed because it was not compatible with his own interests. In 1818 it was reintroduced and passed the House of Commons but was defeated by the Lords. One year later the bill finally passed through both Houses of Parliament. However, it was so modified, crippled, and emasculated that it became meaningless. It applied only to cotton, and not to textiles. It allowed 12 hours of work, and the age limit of a child was fixed in the bill as 9 and not 10. After the age of 9 a child could work in the factory 15 to 18 hours a day.

It was this shameful exploitation of labor by capital and the reducing of man to machines, making human beings slaves of the machine, that stimulated and called forth the powerful socialistic and communistic movements in the first half of the nineteenth century.

The enslavement of man in the preindustrial era was carried out in the name of the despot, who was supposed to rule by the grace of God. The industrial enslavement through the nineteenth century was carried out in the name of that infamous economic and political dogma laissez faire, a principle invented in pre-Revolutionary days, when the despotic and corrupt government under Louis XV held sway. The middle class hated that government and resented their interference in any sphere of life. The representatives of that middle class pleaded with that government to leave them alone. "Laissez faire", they cried—"Leave us alone!" With the ushering in of the industrial era, this almost forgotten principle was reintroduced by the captains of industry to enable them to exploit the masses shamelessly. Their slogan, too, was a minimum of government—"Laissez faire", they demanded; "Leave us alone!" In this cry they were reinforced by the Manchester school of political philosophy, and such men as Adam Smith, Jeremy Bentham, David Ricardo, Thomas Robert Malthus, and John Stuart Mills, who fought for the philosophy of the economic jungle, the principle of laissez faire—"leave business alone." They established the theory that the government was there only to prevent crime, and had no right to interfere in any other sphere of the activities of the citizens, especially not in the economic and social sphere. So dogmatic became that principle that when the Public Health Act was introduced in the English Parliament in 1848, and, in spite of strong opposition, was passed as a result of the activities of the commission revealing most appalling insanitary conditions in most of the big English cities, the Economists, a periodical which represented a view of the followers of the laissez-faire principle, also opposed it on the ground that it was an interference of government with business. The prevalence of the laissez-faire principle for many decades made the development of industrial monopolies and economic imperialism possible, and led to a complete enslavement of the masses, with its attending phenomena—poverty, ignorance, slums breeding disease, and crime. It is not blind chance that the debasement and degradation of man by industrial lords coincides with the rise of cosmocentricism, materialism, and naturalism, culminating in the sanctification of property rights, throughout the last half of the nineteenth century. The anthropocentric world picture was again replaced by a cosmocentric world concept, with the usual result, that property rights were stressed and the representatives of human rights were decried as radicals and revolutionaries.

Just as man disappeared from view throughout a thousand years of the dark Middle Ages, so he has disappeared from view, since industrialism reached its highest peak, in the development of the great industrial and financial combines.

The combines, monopolies, trusts, and corporations are doing to man today what feudalism did to him in the Middle Ages—exploiting him by reducing him as a means to an end only, commercializing him as a tool of the machine. In Russia if a human being kills his fellow man the maximum penalty he receives is 10 years, but if a human being destroys a machine he is shot. Thus the machine has become king, representing property rights, while the human being has become the machine's economic slave.

With this debasement of man goes the degradation of science. It is today the servant of industry, just as philosophy was the handmaid of theology in the Middle Ages. Pure science is no longer an ideal worth the efforts of man's life, but it is only valuable to the extent that it serves the purpose of industry, which in turn serves primarily the purpose of a select few at the expense of many. The moment the great physicist or chemist appears, he is captured by the interests and made to serve the purposes of science only as applied to industry. If these processes will continue much longer, modern science will go the way of Greek philosophy in the beginning of the Middle Ages. Just as medieval theology used Aristotle to prove its dogmas and doctrines, so an Einstein or Michelson may be used one day by capitalistic industry to prove its social and economic contentions. This will to possess more, as it expresses itself today in the transactions of capitalistic industry, has created a one-sided value of life. And what is this value? More money, more wealth, more power, more influence—more, more, more; always the will to possess more. [Applause.]

Everything becomes subordinate to these primary aspirations, to which there is neither logic nor justice. Modern astronomers speak of an expanding universe. Whether the universe is expanding or not cannot be proved scientifically; it is still a hypothesis; but the will to possess more, in the form of corporations, trusts, and combines, is constantly expanding to the advantage of the few and to the detriment of many. The corporation or the juridic person, as the courts have defined the corporation, has enabled a few to expand the will to possess more to dazzling depth and amazing heights. This juridic person called "corporation" has rights and duties of its own which are not the rights and duties of the original members thereof. Consequently the corporation is only a magnified will to possess more; but, on the other hand, it is not endowed with the qualities of the subject of the simple will to possess more. The corporation has no human sympathies, no compassion, no mercy, and no ethical consciousness and no conscience. It is an economic Frankenstein driven by the one powerful instinctive force—to acquire more, to grab more, and to get hold of more. And the process of this expansion is comparable to the hot lava of a volcano, that destroys everything in its wake. The corporation is not an invention of religion or ethics; it is not an emanation of the anthropocentric world picture of Christianity, but of the cosmocentric world concept of ancient Rome.

The term in ancient Roman law corresponding to the modern corporation is collegium, universitas, or corpus. As a rule, it is called collegium. This collegium remained in existence, although all its original members were changed. Like the modern corporation, it was governed by its own by-laws, and, like the modern corporation, there was in the Roman collegium a complete separation in law, between the right of that collegium as a body and those of its individual members. It is interesting to observe that the Roman conception of the corporation was kept alive mainly by the ecclesiastical bodies, organic parts of the medieval church, which was overwhelmed with the spirit of ancient Rome, whose laws were inspired by the motive of might makes right. The original Roman terms for corporation, collegium, or universitas, having been adopted later by religious, ecclesiastical scholastic, and charitable groups and societies, the English lawyers during the time of the Rennaisance and the Reformation upon coming in contact with societies and groups of the above-mentioned nature, adopted the original Roman name corpus, for corporation. The origin of the corporation of England coincides with England's rise to an economic power during the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

The corporation is a magnified will to possess more and the most powerful instrumentality in the accumulation of wealth in the hands of few. Its interests are represented by lawyers who learn to think and do things only in terms of corporations. In the cause of their activities the corporation lawyer looks at the world around him only from the vantage point of the corporation and its interests. In days gone by, when the economic forces in America determined political processes, the political powers would express their gratitude for the services rendered to them by corporations, by appointing corporation lawyers to the Supreme Court, which, according to the Constitution, was to have appellate jurisdiction only, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make. As a result of this development we see a court with appellate jurisdiction usurp the power of the legislative and executive branches of the Government. The people elect legislators to make laws and a President to administer these laws, but then comes the Supreme Court, whose members are only presidential appointees, and void all that was voted for by the people. The result is that America, instead of being a democracy, ruled by a majority of the people, has slowly been turned into a nomocracy; that is to say, a system of government ruled by a rigid and almost immutable law, in whose shaping the people have no part and in whose development the people have no influence. The ancient Greek term "nomas" signifies the static, rigid, and almost immutable law, in contradistinction to thesis, which was the dynamic and living law, subject to change and development and independent of vested interests. Nomocracy, or the rule of rigid law, is the end of all democracy. For in the nomocratic system of government not the will of the majority is the source of law but dead legal formalism, developed by vested interests of the corporations and their lawyers, in shaping the destinies of the country and its people. Nomocracy in ancient as in modern times is the emanation of cosmocentricism, naturalism, and similar sinister philosophies, which are rather medieval in character.

Ancient man thought in mythological and theological terms. Man of the Middle Ages thought in mathematical terms—Descartes, Spinoza, Keppler. Eighteenth century man thought in critical terms—Kant's Critic of Pure and Practical Reason—and modern man thinks in sociological terms. The Supreme Court jurisprudence is archaic, because it is theological, formalistic, static and the impression it gives is, that law is not here to serve man, but that man is to serve the law, to bow before the dead legal formula.

All law is either dynamic or static, either nomos or thesis, either dead or living law, either legal theology or ethics reduced to the juridic formula. The law of the majority of the Supreme Court as it expressed itself in its recent anti-New Deal decisions is static and not dynamic, dead and not living law, is legal theology and not jurisprudence, permeated with the spirit of ethics. In those decisions the majority of the Supreme Court take the position of the church of the Middle Ages, whose representatives said "the church is like the rock in the ocean." The waters come and go but the church stands there forever. Man comes and goes but the church is eternal, and therefore the church is there not to serve man, but man is there to serve the church. The majority decision of the Supreme Court in its anti-New Deal decisions says the legal formula is eternal, and the law is not here to serve man, but man is here to serve the law. No matter what happens in life, the judicial formula stands and life must adjust itself to the legal formula.

It is against this medieval tendency expressing itself in cosmocentricism, property rights, naturalism, and the debasement of man, that the great spiritual forces of our time have risen in rebellion, with the object of restoring to man his dignity, his rights and his position in life—that of an end in himself. Destiny willed it that these spiritual forces to restore to man his rights shall originate in America. This great American civilization of ours must be considered a synthesis of Asia and Europe. Asia is the mother of all religions, Europe the father of science and philosophy, and America the child of both. "And the child shall lead them" was already predicted by the mighty prophet Isaiah. That prophecy of the Bible is now being fulfilled.

In the course of its history, America has experienced three great crises, which shocked it to its very foundation, the first crisis bringing to the fore the fateful problem, "Shall America be free, or a dependency of a foreign nation?" This crisis was overcome by the heroic deeds and leadership of George Washington. Seventy-two years later the second crisis arose, "Shall slavery continue or not?" It was solved by Lincoln. He, like Abraham of old, sacrificed not his son but himself on the altar of human freedom. Seventy-two years still later, in 1933, a third crisis shook America to its very foundation. Then another great leader arose, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, to give man a New Deal, and to free him from the shackles of plutocracy, combines, monopolies, and trusts and give him a minimum of economic security. Franklin Delano Roosevelt is indeed a great Biblical figure, for what is it he said and demanded that wasn't preached and proposed by the prophets of old: Micah, Amos, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Hosea, and Jesus. Is it not the same message to man, social justice, economic justice, to lessen man's worries and to give him peace of mind at all times, whether employed or out of work? What is old-age pensions, unemployment insurance, minimum wages, maximum hours, collective bargaining, abolition of child labor, and security for farmers, if not Biblical ideas? [Applause.]

To carry out this program, it is necessary that the sovereignty of the people, permeated by cosmocentric decisions of the majority of the Supreme Court, be restored to the people. Democratic government is impossible, when a body not elected by and not responsible to the people, can nullify the will of the people, its representatives, and its Chief Magistrate. I say, that to turn the Supreme Court into what the Constitution meant it to be is not a mere governmental reform but is a great world historic deed. For it will open new avenues of progress and will help to make human rights supreme. While the shadows of the Middle Ages are now darkening Europe, a progressive democratic America must be a source of inspiration and courage to all those elements in the Old World, who exhausted themselves in warding off the onslaughts of all sinister forces against humanism. The courageous attempt of President Roosevelt to weaken the citadel erected to protect property rights as against human rights—that is to say, to reduce the Supreme Court to what the Constitution meant it to be—is in reality a continuation of the process begun by the Reformation and the Renaissance. [Applause.] European fascism to the right and to the left has interrupted this process. Franklin Delano Roosevelt, disregarding these sinister forces, has picked up the historical thread and is continuing the great spiritual movement known as humanism. He is the only statesman of our time who, by his New Deal policies culminating in the reform of the cosmocentric attitude of the majority of the Supreme Court, is trying to restore to man his rights, without bloodshed, without a display of brute force, and without deviating one inch from the course of the American historical process. [Applause.]

To sum it up, throughout the ages we see two opposing antagonistic forces in perpetual struggle for supremacy; anthropocentricism versus cosmocentricism; idealism versus naturalism; ethical law versus jungle law; regulated freedom versus regulated force; autocracy in all its forms versus democracy; and human rights versus property rights. In the course of this struggle between these two gigantic forces empires were destroyed, civilizations perished, and nations ground into dust. We now face this tragic issue, and we must face it courageously and manfully. We have got to ally ourselves either with the forces of medievalism, reaction, and darkness or stand squarely for humanism, progress, and enlightenment. I, for one, who is conscious of his duties as a representative of the people, choose to ally myself with the leader of the Nation, Franklin Delano Roosevelt [applause], who stands for human rights, for progress, and for justice. I stand loyally behind him, because justice should not and cannot be compromised. The issue is property rights or human rights! Does might make right or right make might? You either stand for regulated force or regulated liberty! We cannot bargain with human rights, as we cannot bargain with our conscience. [Applause.]

Nothing is more symbolic of modern corporation cosmocentricism than the Laocoon, the great artistic masterpiece of ancient Greece in the Louvre in Paris, showing the figure of a father and two sons being crushed to death by a great python snake. As the snake entwines the bodies of the father and the two sons, you can behold the pain, agony, and suffering undergone by these three human beings as life is crushed out of them. The modern cosmocentric corporation is comparable to the python snake, in the Laocoon. The masses of our people are being exploited, bled white, and crushed by the corporation, as the father and the two sons of the Laocoon group are being crushed by the python snake. The modern cosmocentric corporation is economically, socially, and politically a sinister force whose background is a cosmocentric, naturalistic world picture in which human rights are subordinated to property rights. It is against this sinister force, which deprives man of his birthright by enslaving him economically, socially, and politically, that the twentieth century must rebel in order to bring freedom and happiness into the homes of the American people.

If we continue to struggle, to battle, and to legislate for human rights, in order to enable our citizens under the guiding leadership of that great Biblical, patriarchal, and patriotic character, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, to put into fruition the realization and ideals embodied in human rights for which he is battling, we will be enabled to bring about in our Republic the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God, and thus continue to dedicate and consecrate our Nation upon the altar of true constitutional democracy that it may live on throughout the ages. [Applause.]

Mr. SACKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SACKS. Does the gentleman know whether there was ever a physician on the Supreme Court?

Mr. SIROVICH. In the present Congress of the United States we have two or three physicians. I have the honor to be one of them. I desire to call to the attention of my distinguished colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. SACKS] that in the little town of Barberville, Ky., over 100 years ago, was born to humble parents, a son, whose name was Samuel F. Miller. He studied medicine for 1 year and practiced it for 20. He was a great humanitarian. He administered to the sick, needy, and destitute without compensation, and gave of his today that others might have their tomorrow. He then moved to Iowa. There he studied law during his spare time, and was admitted to the bar. In the great conflict of the Civil War which was waged for human rights to abolish slavery, a vacancy occurred in the Supreme Court of the United States. The beloved, amiable, humane President, Abraham Lincoln, in 1862 selected this distinguished physician, learned in medicine and acquainted with the law, as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. In many of his decisions he contended that the Constitution of the United States must be interpreted as a live, dynamic document that should not act as a strait jacket to imprison the anthropocentric rights that human beings were clamoring for. I sincerely hope when the time comes for President Franklin Delano Roosevelt to appoint additional Justices to the Supreme Court of the United States, that like his great predecessor Abraham Lincoln, he, too, might find some worthy physician or surgeon learned in the law and appoint him to the Supreme Court, that he, too, may interpret the law from an anthropocentric viewpoint, extending liberty, justice, and humanity to those who are living for a better day to arrive in this great Republic of ours.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Permit me to thank the gentleman for his very gracious reference, and I was happy to have the opportunity to hear this eloquent and learned speech by my distinguished friend from New York.

Mr. SIROVICH. May I state to the distinguished son of Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] that I have always entertained the greatest respect and admiration for his human qualities, for his gracious disposition, and for the amiable way in which he has always battled for human rights. In stature he is at least 6 feet and 3 inches, and in personality and appearance the distinguished Representative of Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION] has always appeared to me another Abraham Lincoln. I know the people of his district have the same affection for him that we Members of the House who know him have.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. If the gentleman from New York will yield further, I am reminded that when I first became a candidate for Congress a friend of mine said, "You remind me of Abraham Lincoln." I stretched up about 6 inches, but he said, "You need not stretch up; you are just as homely as Abraham Lincoln, but you never did have the sense and never will have the sense of Lincoln." [Laughter.]

May I say that Samuel F. Miller was a physician and surgeon until he was nearly 40 years of age, when he took up the practice of law. He and Silas Woodson, who later became one of the great Governors of Missouri, were partners in the practice of law in my little home town of Barbourville, Ky. Their law office, a little one-story frame building, still stands. Over the door is written "Attorneys at Law, Silas Woodson and Samuel F. Miller." May I say further that Chief Justice Taft said of Samuel Miller that next to John Marshall he was the greatest influence on American jurisprudence.

Mr. SIROVICH. Apropos of the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky as to the humane virtues and qualifications of Dr. Miller, I am reminded that all great events have responded to the mystic number 3. The ancient Brahmins had three gods, Brahma, Vishnu, and Shivu. The Hebrew patriarchs were Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The Egyptian deities were Osiris, Isis, and Horus. Christianity has Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Masonry has King Solomon; Hiram, King of Tyre; and Hiram Abif. And Kentucky has produced three great men that I love, Abraham Lincoln, Dr. Samuel F. Miller, and the genial gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION]. [Applause.]

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIROVICH. I yield.

Mr. MASON. I have been very much interested and instructed by the gentleman's scholarly address. I believe every Member of the Congress places human rights above property rights, although some of us cannot see how you can separate them, and I believe every Member of the Congress wants to solve the social problems that we have in this day and age, but our problem is to determine which of these two solutions is the better—the packing of the Supreme Court or amending our Constitution to see to it that it will enable us to solve the problems that confront us. The gentleman's scholarly address arrived at the conclusion that we should, and we must, solve these problems, but it did not convince me that the one solution that has been proposed is the true solution. Personally, I feel the only solution is the solution that was laid down by the men who drew up this Constitution, and that is the solution of amending it by and through and of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. SIROVICH. Let me answer the distinguished gentleman's question as a humble physician and Member of Congress and not as a lawyer. He has stated that every Member of Congress places human rights above property rights. If that economic philosophy were carried into realization through legislative enactment, and be approved by a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States, there would be no necessity for increasing the present number of Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. Let me digress for a moment to state to the Members of this House that there are various ways in which the Supreme Court of the United States could be curbed, so far as interpreting the Constitution by the Congress of the United States. At the time the Constitution was formed by 54 members of the Constitutional Convention a plan was formulated, which is now in the Constitution, which gives Congress the right by a two-thirds vote of its House and Senate to override a Presidential veto. James Madison, who was one of the authors of the Constitution of the United States and contributed greatly to its perfection and development, as a delegate to this Constitutional Convention, formulated the idea that Congress should have the right, by a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate, to override the judicial interpretations of the Supreme Court. This formula was known as the Madison plan. However, several delegates to this Constitutional Convention called to the attention of James Madison the fact that Congress was not in session all the year around, and since a decision of the Supreme Court might be handed down after the adjournment of Congress, it would necessitate Members of Congress returning to Washington to override a judicial decision. It might take 3 or 4 months for the Members of Congress to come, from Maine and Georgia, as modes of transportation were slow and cumbersome. On account of this situation James Madison abandoned this plan as impracticable.

However, the Constitution provides many ways in which Congress can change the Supreme Court of the United States. First and foremost, I desire to state to my distinguished colleague from Illinois that five or six times in the history of our Republic the Congress of the United States has numerically enlarged the membership of the Supreme Court. This is within the framework of the Constitution, and no one has ever challenged the constitutional right of Congress to increase or diminish the number of Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States. [Applause.]

Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Grant increased the number of Justices of the Supreme Court during their administrations, ranging from 5 to 10 and back to 9, as we have it today. In the United States at the present time we have 10 circuit courts and we are supposed to have one Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States preside over each circuit. Nine cannot fill the job for 10, because these 10 were present during the administrations of Grant and Lincoln.

Now, can anyone challenge the right of the Congress of the United States to increase the number of Supreme Court Justices? Six precedents for that right exist today. It is thoroughly constitutional. It is an aspersion upon the intelligence of any man to say that that right, which has been established by the Constitution, should be characterized as "packing the Court." If the Congress of the United States shall authorize our great President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, to increase the number of Justices upon the Supreme Court, it will enable the President to dilute the cosmocentric, naturalistic, materialistic property rights decisions that have been repeatedly handed down by a majority of the members of the Supreme Court of the United States invalidating human rights. [Applause.]

Throughout the length and breadth of our country tons of propaganda through newspapers, magazines, periodicals, and publications, as well as the radio, are being disseminated to misinform, to misinterpret, to prejudice, and poison public opinion against the ideals for which the great President of the United States is battling. Human rights must be the master of property rights.

I now come to the question that my distinguished colleague from Illinois has propounded, in which he suggests that we should proceed to change these conditions that he is opposed to by the process of amending the Constitution of the United States. Let me call to his attention that the Constitution states that we have the right to amend the Constitution for any purpose through a two-thirds vote of the House and Senate, and then to be approved by three-fourths of the States of the Union. This constitutional provision enables 12 States, representing 5 percent of the voting population of our Nation, to overcome the will of 95 percent of its people. However, amendments to the Constitution may be effected through conventions held in the 48 States of the Union or through the legislatures of their respective States adopting the amendment, which then becomes a part of the organic law of the Nation.

I, for one, thoroughly agree completely with the President of the United States, that in this great emergency of our Nation, in which one-third of our Republic, 40,000,000 people, are living in hunger, in misery, in poverty, in penury, and in want; one-third ill-fed, ill-clad, and ill-nourished, and ill-housed in a land of plenty, something must be done to guarantee economic security to the homeless, to the helpless, and to those who are looking to the Democratic Party of our Nation through a vote of confidence of 46 States out of 48, that they approve the political philosophy and the economic interpretations of the President of the United States to make our country the greatest and most glorious in the world. The time for decisive action has now arrived. It has taken 16 years to amend the Constitution of the United States to put through the income-tax provision, after one of the Justices of the Supreme Court turned a judicial somersault overnight whereby the Court voted 5 to 4 to declare the income tax unconstitutional. Here in this great Congress of the United States there are sitting many of my colleagues, who 13 years ago voted in favor of submitting a child-labor amendment, which would emancipate the children of our republic under 16 years of age from working in the mills, in the mines, in the looms, and in the factories. This amendment, as passed by Congress 13 years ago, has not been approved as yet by 36 States of the Union. Thirteen years have elapsed. I am ashamed of the conduct of many legislative representatives in the Assembly of New York State, both Republicans and Democrats, who have voted against the privilege of emancipating the flower of our Nation, the American children, from being the economic slaves of industry. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, to me the issue is clear-cut. If we are to preserve this great Republic for which millions of men and women have sacrificed their lives in times of war and peace that our institutions should be preserved, if the blood that hallows the battlefields of our Nation, North and South, East and West, as well as abroad, shall not have been spilled in vain, the time is now propitious and the moment has arrived when America shall proclaim to the world that democracy must live, that the cry of suffering humanity must be heard, and the only way that it can rightfully be answered is by appointing, in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, legally and lawfully, men of learning and patriotism who will have the courage to proclaim the economic philosophy that human rights must be conserved and preserved so that this Republic may go on and endure forever and thus make the world safe for democracy. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] is recognized for 10 minutes.

LET US KNOW THE WORST

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I have also been intrigued by the splendid oration of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH]. I have been instructed, I have received this afternoon information about history that I overlooked in my high-school and college days. As I say, I have been intrigued, I have been pleased with a great part of the splendid oration just concluded, but I think it is about time that we in this House got down to brass tacks.

President Roosevelt in his address of March 4 at the Democratic victory dinner in Washington stressed as the all-important reason behind his demand for immediate dominion over the Federal judiciary "another crisis, fundamentally even more grave than that of 4 years ago." He based upon that dark and alarming statement the plea that he must now be clothed with authority by the Congress to compel the judiciary to interpret the Constitution as Mr. Roosevelt wants it interpreted.

Again, in his radio "fireside chat" on the evening of March 9, he stressed vaguely and darkly this terrible crisis which now faces the country.

Mr. Roosevelt's dire hints are alarming the Nation, particularly in view of the fact that throughout the whole campaign and ever since, up to February 5, he had assured the Nation that the factories were humming with production, that unemployment was rapidly being eliminated, that wages were rising, that purchasing power was being restored—that "Happy Days Are Here Again."

Millions of citizens are asking why it is that in the face of these assurances Mr. Roosevelt has suddenly discovered a "crisis fundamentally even more grave than that of 4 years ago."

If such a crisis exists, it certainly is the right of the American people to know what it is.

If such a crisis exists, it certainly is the duty of the President of the United States to inform the people of the dangers, not in vague, dark, alarming hints, but in a frank statement of the situation.

Is this crisis the threat of some nation or nations to assail us with armed invasion?

Is this crisis revolution within our own borders prepared, all unknown to the President, and to the people, by some group of sufficient proportions to constitute such a "grave situation"?

Is this crisis one of "strikes and disorders" which Mr. Roosevelt referred to in his victory dinner speech, when he said that they "could not forever be settled on a catch-as-catch-can basis"?

Is this crisis inflation, the threat of which has come so suddenly as to catch the President unawares? If this be the case, what has happened to his Czaristic control of the Federal Reserve System through the Federal Reserve Board and of the banking institution of the country through the Treasury Department, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, by means of which control he could prevent any extensive credit inflation?

Certainly not one single constructive object can be achieved by Mr. Roosevelt frightening this country by such vague references.

People all over the Nation are demanding the information, and the President should, if such a crisis exists, trust the American people to know what it is.

Those who have followed the President's argument for his proposal to dominate the judiciary cannot see any such grave crisis in the flood situation, or the Dust Bowl situation, or the trade situation, or the strike situation, unless Mr. Roosevelt has been deliberately withholding from the American people information which rightfully is theirs, and which it would be incredible that he would withhold from them if it exists.

It is with these questions in mind that more and more insistent is growing the demand on the part of leading Democrats, both in Washington and over the country, as well as citizens of every other political complexion, that Mr. Roosevelt specify and clarify these dire and dreadful hints which he has used as the basis of his demand that his orders to the Congress to turn the judiciary over to his domination must be done and done now, because, "We cannot wait one moment beyond the time necessary."

This is a situation which may well cause every thinking citizen to pause and ponder, because one of three conclusions is absolutely inescapable; either Mr. Roosevelt has concealed from the American people information vital to the safety of its citizens, which he should months ago have given them; or else Mr. Roosevelt and his administration have been incredibly remiss in not having discovered the details of any such great crisis long before this; or else this crisis has arisen so suddenly that Mr. Roosevelt and his administration could have known nothing about it heretofore. Certainly the American people are entitled to know what dreadful thing portends; they must have from the President a frank statement of what this great crisis is. And they should have it now.

It is significant, in this connection, that President Roosevelt, in his excoriation of the Supreme Court in his speeches, and his Attorney General and Assistant Attorney General in their testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, have viciously assailed the Supreme Court because, during Mr. Roosevelt's regime, the Court has held more congressional acts unconstitutional than in any similar period in history.

The reason the Supreme Court has had more work to do and has had to invalidate more acts of the Congress during Mr. Roosevelt's administration than ever before in a similar period of time is because the Congress, under the lash of the President's "must" legislation, passed, without study, or with only the most superficial and perfunctory consideration and debate, more loose, ill-advised, and ill-drawn legislation than ever before in history.

Mr. Roosevelt has openly urged the Congress to pass legislation, "regardless of doubts as to its constitutionality, no matter how reasonable"—and Congress has done that.

Now, after having loaded the statute books with this hasty and badly conceived legislation, Mr. Roosevelt viciously attacked the Justices of the Supreme Court because the Court has had to do the work that the Congress should have done.

Under the Constitution the Congress has the same clear duty and obligation to carefully consider the constitutionality of its acts as has the Supreme Court. Previous to Mr. Roosevelt's administration, the Congress has fulfilled its duty under the Constitution, with the result that the Congress itself rejected unconstitutional proposals, instead of doing as it has done under Mr. Roosevelt, passing that duty of rejection on to the Supreme Court.

It is not the Supreme Court's fault, nor is it the fault of any Justices on the Bench, that Mr. Roosevelt has insisted successfully that the Congress ignore its duty of carefully considering constitutionality when it passed in haste the mass of "must" legislation which has been whipped through the Congress during Mr. Roosevelt's regime.

It is manifestly unfair for the President and his aides to now accuse Justices of the Supreme Court of being reactionary to the point of ruining the country because the Court has performed the duty that Congress should have performed and did not perform because Mr. Roosevelt himself demanded and insisted that the Congress ignore that duty and leave it for the Supreme Court to perform.

Such tactics, in the light of Mr. Roosevelt's own admonitions to the Congress to disregard the constitutional phases of legislation, are unworthy of a President of the United States. [Applause.]

NAZI-ISM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under special order the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, it has been stated, particularly from German sources, that fascism is not an article of export, and that the Fascists are not interested in converting the world to their doctrine. Events of the last few weeks have clearly demonstrated that this statement is untrue, and that just as the Communists maintain an Internationale, the Fascists likewise are more than apt masters in the art of propaganda seeking to convert the world at large to the idea that in fascism lies the solution of our present ills.

Some weeks ago, when I had occasion to address the House on the subject of Nazi propaganda in the United States, I remarked that "a democracy has no right to commit suicide as it did in Germany." We must be forever on our guard, since the forces of fascism have the tendency of engulfing us if we do not watch out. The German press in the last few days has been engaged in promiscuous attacks against our country. America was depicted in the German press as being a country governed by gangsters and ruffians and having a civilization which is brutal and not worth preserving. Some of the press releases from Germany quote Goebbels' sheet as making the statement that America is not worth while and that Germany's great leader would not be interested in America because of its low-grade civilization which is not worthy of preservation.

This line of attack on America is nothing new. And remember that when the German press indulges in comments on our country it is not merely the expression of private opinion, since in Germany, as you know, the press is not free as it is in our democratic country. No one has the right to say a word in the German press unless his remarks have been previously sanctioned by the Ministry of Propaganda, which is presided over by Paul Joseph Goebbels, the German Minister of "Propaganda and Public Enlightenment." This Ministry directs what may or may not be printed in Germany, and any attack in the press against any person of authority in the United States is fully and thoroughly sanctioned by the German authorities. Do not fool yourself into believing that these things are spontaneous and that expressions in the German press do not represent the attitude of the German Government. Quite the contrary. Every word that you read in the German newspaper is "official" and does come there with the sanction of the Government. During the last election campaign, and even after the election of our President, newspapers in Germany were full of insidious attacks on our Chief Executive, charging him with all kinds of crimes and misdemeanors, and particularly pointing out the fact that the President did not know how to solve the economic problems of America, something which the head of the German Government has been able to do satisfactorily and well. Incidentally, this line of attack on our Chief Executive was copied by the local Nazi sheets in New York and elsewhere, and full advantage was taken by our Nazi neighbors of the liberty and freedom prevailing here which permits the humblest citizen to criticize the Chief Executive of the Nation.

But when it comes to a criticism of the divine head of the German Government, that is quite another matter. To paraphrase the German press releases which came to us in the last few days, the attitude of the German press seems to be that it is perfectly all right to criticize our President, since he is only one of many Presidents we have had or may have, but God forbid if anyone were to criticize the chief executive of the German nation. His person is not subject to any criticism. He is like God Almighty, who can do no wrong, and, as I pointed out the other day, if ever any individual came near to deification in his lifetime it was just this head of the German nation who is revered by his subjects as the nearest approach to perfection as is possible on this earth of ours.

The German President also permits criticism of our President, since he is only, to quote from the language of the German newspapers, "one of many Presidents which America can have from time to time", and who come and go like the seasons of the year or the wind.

But the German leader is one who cannot change and who is a historic person, like our George Washington, and I am again quoting from the German newspapers, and, of course, no one in the world has the right to criticize him or call his actions into question.

A journal which is full of invectives against America and all things American is Der Sturmer, a sheet published in Nuremberg, Germany, by the notorious Julius Streicher, who is Hitler's official leader in Franconia, and as such wields tremendous influence throughout Germany, and is the official spokesman of his master.

His paper has been indulging in continuous attacks on this country and thousands of copies of his sheet have come to the United States for distribution among people who can read German. Nor is the flood of literature coming from that country diminishing in any way.

During my investigation of un-American activities, as a member and vice chairman of the committee created by this House in 1934, I had occasion to point out this menace coming through the flood of printed propaganda from Germany. Again on the floor of this House on many occasions did I show by well chosen exhibits this incessant importation of German propaganda material for distribution in the United States. Nor is this country the only country concerned with this type of propaganda. I have before me part of an English journal entitled News Review, dated February 11, 1937, which points out that at the German Embassy in London a powerful radio transmitter has been put up by means of which highly confidential information was sent to Berlin in code. The statement is also made in that paper that one Ernst Bohle, who is an English born Nazi official and who was refused by the British Government to be accepted as consul to London, was made the head of a separate department in the foreign organization of the Nazi party and prepared a card index containing 30,000,000 names of Germans living abroad, who could be enlisted whenever Germany may need their services.

"And", said the newspaper, "his card index paid special attention to those in America." I must again remind Congress that this is not an isolated instance that any statement that Fascism is not for export is not true and that this attempt to card index every German anywhere in the world, paying particular attention to Germans residing in America calls for congressional action.

Public attention must be centered on the evidence of the last few days to show the vicious manner in which our public officials were criticized and insulted. You see, the tendency of the German press and the German molders of public opinion is to attack everybody who does not agree with them.

The mayor of New York City was severely criticized because he dared to charge the German chieftain with being an instigator of war. But, after all, what is this "sound and fury" eminating from German sources but a plan to engulf the whole world in another conflict. The German press is stifled. There is no such thing as expressing one's views in Germany on public questions, so some outlet must be found to insult other nations or statesmen of other countries so as to keep the press at least partly interesting, because otherwise there would be nothing to write about in Germany. When you cannot criticize your own officials it is so easy to criticize officials of other nations.

The American people, of course, look with contempt upon the so-called criticism leveled against it in the German public press. We do not feel insulted if Germany has no faith in our democracy and our liberal institutions. It is precisely this inability to grasp the fundamentals of democracy which made it possible for the Nazi government to come into power. If German democracy knew how to defend itself it would never have allowed the fanatics of the Third Reich to become the leaders of its destinies.

We have no quarrel with the German people, and if they wish to have the form of government which they have, it is their privilege, but if they are so brazen as to criticize our Government and to send their poisonous propaganda into this country trying to stir up strife and dissatisfaction among our people, the time has come for us to call a halt and to stop this vicious propaganda before it is too late.

Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of this House, I again rise in serious protest against so much un-American and subversive activity within our own Government. It seems that we are just sitting back, and in the terms of the street, taking it on the chin. I was sorry to see our great Secretary of State, for whom I have the highest esteem and admiration, even attempt to apologize for what a citizen of my city, who happens to be mayor of that city, said. It was not necessary. If any apology were due, it was due to the American people from Germany, and there is not enough paper in Germany to write the apology. For 3 solid long years the German Government has brought slander upon our people, more than Members of this House can even read.

We did not ask for an apology at that time. Then, after this apology was made by the Secretary of State for what a citizen said under his constitutional rights, the German Government and its papers slandered willfully and maliciously the womanhood of America, and their attacks were so coarse that I am ashamed to repeat them on the floor of this House. You no doubt read about it in the daily press. Then our Secretary of State saw fit to ask the German Government for an apology for what was charged in Germany against the purity of our American women, and we got nothing. Mr. Speaker, I commend the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], who had the courage last Friday to stand up and be counted in protest against this malicious slander of the American people. Someone has told me that if the Rules Committee should vote out this resolution he did not think I would get enough votes in the House to pass it. I am willing to gamble on that. I know that Members of Congress will support any resolution that will put the searchlights upon subversive and un-American activities, and upon groups attacking our democracy and the liberty of our people.

A few weeks ago I charged on this floor that one Fritz Kuhn was the new leader of nazi-ism, designated and appointed by Hitler.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In a moment. I told you then and I am telling you now that he has an organization of alien spies and agitators, close to 200,000, and half of them are in uniform and half of them are drilling in our communities in different sections of the country. I told you at that time that Fritz Kuhn was working for Ford. I still say that he is working for Ford, and I am finding no fault with that at all. I have the highest esteem for Mr. Ford. He may not know all the facts in the case, but in a statement that Fritz Kuhn himself made, he admits that he is the Nazi leader in this country, and he admits that there are 200,000 of these subversive agitators in his organization, which I charge is attacking democracy.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. The gentleman says that there are 200,000 Nazi agitators in this country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Will the gentleman also tell the House how many Communist agitators there are in this country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There are less Communist agitators, and I hold no brief for them—I have no more use for them than I have for Hitler; and if my friend will go back a little bit in history he will learn that because of my activity against these Communists they paraded before my home for 9 long months and made life miserable for me because I felt they had no right to advocate communism or any other "ism" in this land of ours.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Is that the answer to the question?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is the answer to the question.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I only have 15 minutes.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. The gentleman did not quite answer the question.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I say there are less agitators of communism than nazi-ism, but they are just as bad.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. But the gentleman will admit there are more Communists in this country than there are Nazis?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Not now. I would say that 6 months ago, but we have wiped out the Communist Party from the election ballot last year. They do not even have enough to get on the fifth ballot, if there was such a ballot.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. The gentleman has more Communists in his own district than there are Nazis in the United States.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I just want to challenge the statement made by the gentleman from New Jersey about my district. In the last election there were not 200 Communists who voted in my district. I have driven the rest of them away from there. I want to tell the gentleman that in my check-up there are not 300 Communists in my district, because I have educated some of them and some of them I have driven away.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Is this man Kuhn, whom the gentleman has mentioned, a citizen or an alien?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. He recently became a citizen. He went to Germany about 6 months ago. He brought a signature book containing about a thousand or more signatures of American workers, to show what they were doing in the United States. He took 500 men, or as he himself said, "only 400", in uniform and paraded them before Hitler in Germany. He presented this book to Mr. Hitler.

Mr. MOTT. I think the gentleman's proposition for an investigation is all right. Will the gentleman tell us why he cannot get it out of committee? What is the trouble? What can we do to help the gentleman?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have a resolution, numbered 88. I appeared before the Rules Committee last week, but incidentally, I do not think I will have enough time to discuss all the facts and I hope I can get a little more time. I should like to answer the question.

Mr. MOTT. I think the gentleman should ask for more time in order to permit Members who do not know as much about this as the gentleman does, to ask him questions. I think the gentleman has a wealth of information and we would all like to hear about it, but unless we can ask questions, we will not get much information.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will be happy to do it if I can get the time.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. MAAS. Would the gentleman be willing to include Mexico in his resolution?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The way I feel, I will include anybody everywhere who is subversive to our Government.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman stated before the Rules Committee as he has stated here that this man Fritz Kuhn is in the employ of Mr. Ford. The gentleman today says that he has no complaint to make about that. I saw in the paper either yesterday or the day before a story saying that this man Kuhn was a chemist. I would like to ask the gentleman if he is a permanent employee of Mr. Ford, or if he is simply acting as a chemist on special work?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. My best information is that he has been with Ford for the past few years. Being fair about the matter, it looks to me that in the last year he is a sort of a temporary employee, because he has gone across so often, and he has taken over with him men in uniform, under threat of sabotage and injury that might come to them if they did not obey the command of this great leader.

Mr. MAPES. Does the gentleman wish to imply from what he has said that Mr. Ford has any part in these subversive activities?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not. I never have contended that.

Mr. MAPES. I think, then, that ought to be made clear.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I thank the gentleman. I am making that clear. I make no charge against Mr. Ford.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield briefly.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Does the gentleman's resolution also include an investigation into communism as well as nazi-ism?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Everybody.

Now, I say to you, in the past it has been thought sufficient for the protection of the Government of the United States to have an Army and a Navy, but now we seem to have reached the point when we have 100,000 Nazis, all in uniform, directed and dictated to by a foreign government, tell us that they think it necessary to protect America. Here is their picture that Mr. Kuhn specially posed for, to be given to the press. When they asked him what authority he had to do this, he said, "We are just trying to combat communism in this country." They said, "Why must you raise your hand to Hitler four times a day when you are trying to combat communism?" The fact of the matter is that he is no more trying to combat communism than the Communists themselves. He is just a confounded liar and perjurer, and is trying to throw dust and dirt into the eyes of American people to cover up his subversive agitation.

I told you some time ago, and I tell you again, that there are millions of dollars of German money in this country at the disposal of Mr. Kuhn for release to these so-called spies who do the dirty work in this country.

Mr. Speaker, only 2 days ago these subversive agitators, these Nazis, went to one of the finest Jewish temples in this country in the early morning and pasted on that building the most filthy sheets of propaganda and swastikas—so many of them that you could not recognize the building. Only a year ago they went to two of the finest Catholic churches and pasted on them the most vicious and slanderous documents. And here we sit back and ask what is going on! O my friends, I do not have to tell you now, for I have been begging this Congress for the last 2 months to give me some power to throw the searchlight upon these agitators who are breaking the backbone of democracy.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have but 5 minutes, and I would like to bring this matter to the attention of the House.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. The gentleman has been granted additional time. I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Get me some more time, and I shall be glad to answer questions.

What do you think! Camp Yaphank in New York was the camp from which we sent out our boys during the World War. Do you know that the Nazis are now drilling there? Do you know that they drilled there yesterday morning with fine polished boots and in the full military uniform of Germany? Yesterday they were taught the goose step; that was the lesson for yesterday, it was goose-step Sunday. Many Americans were standing around, yes; but they were helpless. The police were helpless, too, because the Germans bought that property with German money instead of using it to pay interest on the German bonds held by 700,000 Americans. They spend $50,000,000 to spread Nazi doctrines in this country, but not one dollar to pay interest on the bonds held by 700,000 American working men and working women, bonds bought in good faith.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the gentleman will get me some more time, I shall be glad to yield. I want to conclude my statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Fritz Kuhn goes me one better. The last time I spoke on this subject I told you they were organized in 16 States. Fritz Kuhn admits that they are organized in 42 States and that they have an organization that some day will be called upon by Germany to do what? Oh, you cannot take it away from Mr. Hitler, he is very smart. He is organizing an army in every country where there is a German. He is even telling these men to join militias. He is even telling them to join any camp that will give them training. Why? I have documentary proof to show that Mr. Hitler is calling the men of 1917 and 1921 for military duty. These men under Hitler's rule must go back to Germany and drill in the labor camps. In lieu of going back to Germany he gives them permission to drill in the United States of America.

Mr. Speaker, as I say, I am not defending communism, nor am I defending the black shirts, nor the Black Legion, which are domestic crops—and I wish I could show you, all of you, the facts about the Black Legion. It would blow the roof off this Capitol. You have not even scratched the Black Legion. You do not even know how far it extends. What about the Fascist groups in this country?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may have 15 minutes additional time in which to answer questions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York desire additional time?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes to complete my statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. On what does the gentleman base his statement as to the number of Nazis? What evidence has the gentleman?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In the first place Fritz Kuhn, who, I charge, is the leader, in three different interviews admits 200,000.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Who interviewed him?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Reporters from four or five newspapers. He admitted having 200,000 followers in 42 States.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Will the gentleman name the newspapers to which he refers?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have quite a number of them. I shall be glad to let the gentleman look them over.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. I would like to have the names of these newspapers. Who gave the gentleman this information?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman from Nebraska has the same information on that that I have. Fritz Kuhn admits to 200,000. I said they were only in 16 States.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. I would like to have the gentleman name the newspapers. I would like to know the names of those newspapers.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will put that in the RECORD. I want my time used to answer questions. The papers referred to above are the New York American, the New York Times, the New York Herald Tribune, the New York Daily News, and many other papers throughout the country too numerous to mention. The papers are of March 13, 1937, and subsequent dates.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman said a little while ago that wherever there are German people they are attempting to organize Nazi troops. Does the gentleman mean to infer in those sections of this country where there is a predominance of German people that they are particularly active?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is right.

Mr. BOILEAU. May I submit to the gentleman I live in a community where the people are overwhelmingly of German descent. I do not believe he will find a more loyal group of people in the United States. I do not believe any headway has been made in organizing Nazi troops in that section of the country.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am glad the gentleman called that to my attention. I have never yet, either on this floor or anywhere else, made any charge against the real German-Americans.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate that.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They are absolutely against this Nazi madman.

Mr. BOILEAU. In my community there is no evidence of that activity.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am glad of that. I may be able to give the gentleman something in his community if the gentleman is really interested.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am very much interested.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will tell him who Mr. Kuhn's leader is, and I will tell him where they drill if they are organized in your State—as I have good reason to believe.

Mr. BOILEAU. I will be glad to have any information of that kind.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I shall be glad to advise the gentleman.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. I would like to find out, if I can, what is holding up the gentleman's resolution. If what he says is correct, it seems to me that nobody should object to having an investigation made by a committee of this House. What appears to be the trouble?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am not charging any ill motives to the committee. They asked me to come back again this week to continue my discussion before that committee. When I am advised I shall be glad to go back and submit to them other documentary evidence that will convince any reasonable man.

Mr. MOTT. That is the Committee on Rules?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is the Committee on Rules. I think I can convince them that there is a serious problem to be solved, and I believe by this time, through the public press, they know the menace.

Mr. MOTT. Then the gentleman expects no trouble?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not think I should have any trouble at all. I took the time this afternoon to enlighten the Members of the House upon certain matters that transpired within the last week, which substantiate what I have told you 2 and 3 weeks ago, and emphasize the fact that the problem is right at our doorstep now.

Mr. MOTT. I hope the gentleman succeeds in his efforts. If I may make a suggestion, if things are taking place in this country that he says are taking place, it seems to me there would not be any particular use in having an investigation; that the gentleman might better propose a statute that would punish these people who are Americans and deport those who are aliens and those who are taking part in this kind of propaganda.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have gone into that matter. You have to have the power of subpena to put the searchlight on this matter and show where the money comes from, who is financing the movement and who is behind it, because Mr. Kuhn claims in the press that they are tied up with 125 additional organizations in this country. You cannot pass a law until you go into the matter thoroughly and we should do it as conscientious Americans. I do not want to be appointed chairman of this committee or to lead it. I do not care whom the Speaker appoints. I am willing to turn my documents over to him. My job will then be done when I, as an American, a Member of this honorable body, can bring these things to your attention. It is a serious problem.

May I conclude with this statement. The Legislature of the State of Indiana without my solicitation, knowing of their troubles with the Klan, and you are not through with the Klan, passed a resolution at the capitol in Indianapolis endorsing House Resolution 88 and asking the Congress to pass this resolution.

The American Legion, one of the greatest bodies of soldiers in our country today, sent their representatives down to my office and I submitted all of my exhibits to them. I told them just what is going on in this country. The American Legion endorsed this resolution 100 percent.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars, another great group of former soldiers, through a committee, contacted my office and I exhibited these documents to them. They gave me unqualified endorsement. I have received endorsements from patriotic organizations throughout this country endorsing this resolution. This is not a speech or idle talk. I am pleading with you from my heart, as one American to another, that we must go into this matter thoroughly, and the quicker we do so the better off this country will be.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Does the gentleman think this can be cured by legislation, and, if so, what legislation?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No. We cannot pass laws without knowing just what we are legislating them for or just how we are going to apply them. If I show you and the country that there are certain superpatriots who have been subsidizing some of these subversive activities in this country and have been using these groups as a means of attacking the President of the United States, the First Lady of the Land, and other public officials, and I have proof of that, you should agree with me that it is high time to do something about it.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. The gentleman is not answering my question.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am answering the gentleman's question. He is more insistent in my giving him the newspapers that Fritz Kuhn's statement was put in, and I am not interested in that. I am telling the gentleman that.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. We are entitled to have that information. Further, the gentleman made the statement that wherever German citizens live there is a Nazi troop and they were drilling. I have a very large number of Germans in my district, and I would be very glad if the gentleman would give me the names of those who are sponsoring nazi-ism in my district.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I shall be glad to take that trouble for the especial benefit of the gentleman. I have records that the gentleman and 10 other men could not carry in here.

Mr. BEITER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BEITER. Has the gentleman ever submitted his data and exhibits to the Department of Justice?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes; but not since the last investigation.

Mr. BEITER. What has been their attitude?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They are helpless. When this Congress gave us the power in 1934 to investigate subversive activities we asked the Department of Justice and other departments for help, and here is what we bumped up against: The committee which investigated these subversive activities during the Seventy-third Congress had occasion to serve important witnesses with subpenas requesting that they produce certain papers and documents. The legal representatives of these witnesses and their respective organizations, including the Communist Party, refused to produce these papers, basing their refusal on the ground that Congress was not in session at the time and that the subpenas were not issued from the District of Columbia.

The committee, which had but little time for its immense task of investigating all these groups, then communicated with the Attorney General, and the United States Federal district attorney in New York then informed the committee that due to an old law, which was still on the statute books, the witnesses were not guilty of misdemeanor in this case because of the fact that Congress was not in session and that the subpenas had not been issued from the District of Columbia.

During the Seventy-fourth Congress, following the recommendations made by the special committee which had encountered these difficulties, the House passed a bill correcting this evil, so that now anyone who refuses to obey a subpena issued by any congressional committee will be guilty of misdemeanor, no matter whether the House is in session or not or whether the subpena is issued in the District or in some other part of the country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOUSTON). Under special order of the House, the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KING] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, several bills have been introduced into this Congress having for their object the continuation of Government control of the sugar industry. I am deeply concerned at the tendency they all show to treat the sugar producers of my Territory differently from other domestic producers. We have been growing sugarcane in Hawaii for over 100 years, and have built up a stable economy based on this industry in the same way that other communities have concentrated on the raising of cotton, or wheat, or some other commodity that proved best adapted to their conditions.

Nearly 39 years ago Hawaii was annexed to the United States by mutual consent of the two nations. The formerly independent nation shares with Texas alone the distinction of having come under the American flag by voluntary annexation. Hawaii was incorporated as a Territory and took its place in the Union as such, together with the then existing Territories of Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona. There was no question of accepting any inferior or subordinate position in the Nation except that inherent in a Territorial form of government. Its citizens became American citizens at the very moment of annexation by the very terms of the joint resolution of annexation itself. The Constitution followed the flag so far as Hawaii was concerned, and all the laws of the United States became immediately applicable to its people. Even its incorporation as a Territory carried out an American precedent, which, established by the Northwest Ordinance, actually antedates the Constitution.

In all these years Hawaii has lived up to every obligation of American citizenship. As an indivisible part of the Nation it has borne every burden that any other American community bears. The coastwise navigation laws apply to it, so that we do our share toward supporting an American merchant marine. The tariff laws include it, so that our people buy American commodities and merchandise as exclusively as the people of any one of the 48 States. In fact, the interstate commerce of Hawaii with other parts of the country makes it, per capita of population, a market for our country's products which is exceeded by few, if any, of the agricultural States.

Every national tax applies with equal effect in Hawaii as in the 48 States. As a source of revenue to the United States Treasury, Hawaii has consistently paid in Federal taxes much more than many States, exceeding 17 States in 1936. Being so completely part and parcel of the Nation, it exchanges its products in the American market. No other market is open to its products except such as are open to all American producers. With all this background, historical and legal, it would seem axiomatic that all national legislation would treat Hawaii as an integral part of the United States and on a parity with the 48 States.

Unfortunately, because of our geographical location, our physical separation from the mainland, and perhaps because we do not have a vote in Congress, this is not always done. A large portion of the work of the Delegate from Hawaii is to scan bills of national import to see if Hawaii has been inadvertently overlooked, or less inadvertently treated in a different manner from the 48 States. Incidentally such omissions seldom occur in revenue measures or other bills of a restrictive nature, but they seem often to occur in measures extending certain benefits or grants.

Hawaii asks no exemptions from the duties and obligations borne by all, considering them a small price to pay for the great privilege of being an American community. Hawaii does ask that in all fairness it be treated no differently from the rest of the United States in apportioning the benefits that accrue to all parts of America. Specifically, existing and proposed sugar legislation does treat Hawaii differently from other sugar producers in the United States. The law now, and as it is proposed as a permanent sugar policy, places Hawaii outside the pale of the United States and associates it with insular possessions, a semi-independent, and a foreign, country.

This is a denial of our status as an incorporated Territory, as an integral part of the United States, a disregard of the fundamental difference between Hawaii and the areas with which it is classed. Such legislation is not even necessary, since our production is limited, and our inclusion with mainland producers would still not supply America's demand for sugar. It would seem a simple matter to do justice to Hawaii without deducting one ton from other American basic production. If any limitation of domestic production is necessary, then the same measuring stick should apply to all American industry alike. Hawaii is not a competitor of mainland sugar producers, but joins with them in providing the American market with less than one-half of this great market's requirements.

May I hope, then, that Congress, in its final action on sugar legislation will heed the plea I am making as the sole spokesman Hawaii has in this great body, and establish the only just principle that all parts of the United States are entitled to equal treatment. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the St. Lawrence seaway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in connection with neutrality legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent t extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of th gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

NEUTRALITY ACT OF 1937

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent States; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, the neutrality bill of 1937, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, there is a magnificent floral display in the Botanic Gardens which everyone ought to see. It will remain open today and until 10 o'clock tomorrow night.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF.]

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the chairman and the members of the Foreign Relations Committee for their courtesy to myself and others extended to us during the committee hearings. Those hearings that I was able to attend were free and open and the discussion was in the nature of friendly cooperation to arrive at a solution of this problem. I also wish to commend the Committee on Rules for giving 10 hours of debate to this question as the gravity of the problem certainly deserves full and open discussion.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Free and open discussion, to my mind, can never injure any cause. In fact I believe that only good can come from free and open discussion of our problems. Nor should we shut our ears to the suggestions and advice of any and every person who is interested. I, therefore, believe that no criticism or censure should be given the Social Security Board Union who are civil-service employees because they sent the following telegram:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 11, 1937.

HOUSE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE,
Capitol Hill, Washington, D. C.

Feel that McReynolds so-called neutrality bill is actually not neutrality bill, but pro-Facist, and not in keeping with American traditions. Urge its defeat.

The chairman of the committee felt that that telegram was insulting. I have read it on 3 successive days, purposely avoiding any hasty judgment on the subject, and I cannot agree with the chairman. To me the telegram contains nothing insulting to the chairman or the members of his committee. It is criticism, pure and simple, and as such should be accepted without censure. We progressives firmly believe in the right of all citizens of the United States to criticize public officials and their public acts. To adopt a contrary attitude would be to deny our citizens the right of freedom of speech and to deny our press the right of freedom of the press. We progressives also firmly believe in the rights of the people to petition their government relative to any public matters. War and its dire consequences are the great concern of us all and we should not close our ears to the protests of any of our people from the highest to the lowest. After all, what are Members of Congress? Simply the servants of the people, and as such servants we should also be open to approach either by the spoken or the written word. The rights of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of assembly, and freedom of conscience in religious worship have been bought at too dear a price to be lightly disregarded. A long list of outstanding figures who served as champions in these causes honor the pages of history with their martyrdom—Socrates drinking the hemlock; Johann Huss burned at the stake; the Spanish priest, Savonarola, his eyes burning with the zeal of his great mission in the face of certain death, denouncing the licentiousness of Lorenzo the Magnificent; Martin Luther, at the Diet of Worms, "Hier steh ich, Martin Luther. Gott hilf mir, ich kann nicht anders." All these and many others attest the courage and devotion of those who insisted on these great principles. Differ from them in thought if you will, but give your approval to the principle of freedom of expression. Government employees are also citizens. The fact that they have civil-service rating cannot exclude them from an interest and participation in public questions. I believe that this Social Security Board Union acted fully within its rights and should not be censured and criticized for exercising those rights.

NEUTRALITY

Neutrality is an idealistic abstraction that is difficult to attain. We are all human, and are therefore inclined to take sides in any controversy. When foreign wars occur, we, consciously or unconsciously, line up for or against one side or the other in any dispute. Our racial antecedents influence us to a great extent. Yet calmer reflection must impress us with the only sound position we can take on any argument, and that is this: Every citizen of the United States must be for the United States first, last, and all the time. To adopt any other attitude would be to adopt a theory of divided loyalty. The problem we must consider is legislative neutrality, which comes before us from two different viewpoints:

First. Mandatory neutrality.

Second. Discretionary neutrality.

Of these two we must make a choice. The only way we can arrive at a choice is by our experience immediately preceding the World War. At the outbreak of that holocaust we were not involved and our President rightly declared a policy of strict neutrality. Our people observed such a policy, but so great were the demands of the belligerent nations for goods and supplies that our factories were running day and night to meet their orders.

In September 1915 Mr. Lansing, then Secretary of State, wrote President Wilson the following letter, and as a result of his recommendations we deserted our policy of strict neutrality and liberalized it so as to permit foreign loans from this country to belligerents, and the French Premier Tardieu made his shrewd observation, "Now their money is in, their men will soon follow." Results bore out the French statesman's prediction.

Secretary Lansing's letter follows:

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Doubtless Secretary McADOO has discussed with you the necessity of floating Government loans for the belligerent nations which are purchasing such great quantities of goods in this country, in order to avoid a serious financial situation which will not only affect them but this country as well.

Briefly, the situation, as I understand it, is this: Since December 1, 1914, to June 30, 1915, our exports have exceeded our imports by nearly a billion dollars, and it is estimated that the excess will be from July 1 to December 31, 1915, a billion and three-quarters. Thus for the year 1915 the excess will be approximately two and a half billions of dollars.

It is estimated that the European banks have about three and a half billions of dollars in gold in their vaults. To withdraw any considerable amount would disastrously affect the credit of the European nations, and the consequence would be a general state of bankruptcy.

If the European countries cannot find means to pay for the excess of goods sold to them over those purchased from them, they will have to stop buying, and our present export trade will shrink proportionately. The result would be restriction of outputs, industrial depression, idle capital and idle labor, numerous failures, financial demoralization, and general unrest and suffering among the laboring classes.

Probably a billion and three-quarters of the excess of European purchases can be taken care of by the sale of American securities held in Europe and by the transfer of trade balances of oriental countries, but that will leave three-quarters of a billion to be met in some other way.

Furthermore, even if that is arranged, we will have to face a more serious situation in January 1916, as the American securities held abroad will have been exhausted.

I believe that Secretary McADOO is convinced—and I agree with him—that there is only one means of avoiding this situation which would so seriously affect economic conditions in this country, and that is the flotation of large bond issues by the belligerent governments. Our financial institutions have the money to loan, and wish to do so. On account of the great balance of trade in our favor, the proceeds of these loans would be expended here. The result would be a maintenance of the credit of the borrowing nations based on their gold reserve, a continuance of our commerce at its present volume and industrial activity, with the consequent employment of capital and labor and national prosperity.

The mistake we made at that time was to change our rules of neutrality after the war had begun. Therefore, I believe we should make our rules of neutrality now and then adhere to them. Furthermore, I believe that those rules should be hard and fast rules, so that no one but Congress can change them.

DISCRETIONARY NEUTRALITY

Discretionary neutrality leaves the working of the law in the hands of one man, namely, the President; and I am strongly opposed to leaving such vast powers, the right to plunge 128,000,000 people into war, in the hands of one man. There is no man living or dead to whom I would ever want to grant such vast authority. There is another evil about discretionary neutrality and that is this: A President strongly sympathetic to one side of a controversy could delay issuing a proclamation declaring that a state of war exists; he could delay foreign commerce to one set of nations abroad and favor another set of nations abroad; he could close his eyes to the smuggling of munitions contrary to law; he could close his eyes to loans and credits—in short, in a thousand and one ways he could greatly favor one set of belligerents to the injury of another set. I believe in mandatory neutrality so as to leave as little discretion as possible to any one man. By passing a mandatory neutrality act now we serve notice on all the world that we have a definite policy and we let the whole world know what that policy is. On the contrary, if we make our rules discretionary, we advise the world that our policy is indefinite and uncertain, because we have delegated to one man, our President, the right to fix those rules if and when the spirit moves him. In such an event we are sure to gravely offend one or the other of the belligerent nations.

GREAT LAKES

The question has been raised as to traffic on the Great Lakes. Need I remind you that if you are in fact neutral, then you cannot play any favorites, and Canada cannot and must not be considered a most-favored nation. The very friendly relations that have existed between Canada and this Nation ought to be preserved for all future time, and I am satisfied that the peoples of both countries want it so. Our vast frontier stretching across the entire continent without a fort and without an army attests to the fact that we are friendly peoples. I do not want that relation endangered by discretionary neutrality.

WATER-BORNE COMMERCE

Perhaps, after all, we are laying too much stress on water-borne commerce. The air routes now existing across the Pacific and across the Atlantic clearly demonstrate that in 5 years, or perhaps 10, ships would be much too slow to serve the demands of war. Personally I believe we lay too much emphasis on the importance of commerce borne in the holds of the ships that sail the seas. Aircraft and submarines will, no doubt, demonstrate the futility of water-borne commerce, for we know that every war produces new conditions and new inventions that alter entirely not only the method of warfare but even the living conditions of noncombatants, and the next war will be no exception.

EFFECT ON TREATIES

One more subject that should certainly be considered is the effect of any neutrality legislation on our treaties with foreign nations, especially our reciprocal-trade agreements. We cannot very well make treaties with foreign nations in which we set forth what they can sell us and what we can sell them and then later on violate those treaties, when the very commodities enumerated in those treaties may be vital to the needs of the contracting parties; therefore, we must, as a corollary to our neutrality legislation, make proper changes in our treaties with foreign powers so that we are not guilty of violating our agreements and offending friendly nations.

DOES NOT PREVENT WAR

None of us believe that neutrality can prevent war, but we do believe that if we notify the world in advance what our rules are, and that we are sincere about those rules, then we tell them all that we intend to keep our hands off and they need not come to us for money or for goods to help out in their emergencies. [Applause.]

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I yield.

Mr. KLOEB. I should be pleased to answer the gentleman's question. The Committee has been assured by the Department of State that the proposed legislation now before the House will interfere in no way or embarrass them in the slightest in connection with the treaties now in existence or about to be put into existence.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I am very pleased to have that explanation. I think we ought to go into that subject in detail.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Certainly.

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman ought to be a little more explicit, because the information which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KLOEB] just gave the House is not at all what I understand the situation to be.

Mr. KLOEB. The gentleman will find it in the hearings.

Mr. FISH. Yes; but that applies to arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and they are generally excluded by international usage, but when it comes to commodities such as wheat, foodstuffs, copper, iron, and so on, it might be, and I believe it is, a direct violation of the commercial treaties we have entered into with a dozen or more nations.

Mr. KLOEB. The assurance of the representative of the Department of State covered the whole field and was not confined merely to arms and munitions of war.

Mr. FISH. I know from former hearings that the reverse of the statement was made, and I see no reason to change it on commodity.

Mr. KLOEB. The only reference they made in former hearings was a year ago when a representative of the Department of State discussed the possible effect of the then proposed bill on the Italian commercial treaty, and that was the only discussion we ever had in our committee on the question.

Mr. FISH. I shall have to differ with the gentleman, because we had a number of international lawyers before the committee, such as the professor of international law from Yale. Professor Borchard made a specific statement.

Mr. KLOEB. I understand. It is in the record. I am speaking of representatives of the Department of State who handled these treaties, actually had the duty of making them and enforcing them.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman got it from some subordinate in the State Department and not from the Secretary of State.

Mr. KLOEB. They are the men in charge of those treaty-making matters.

Mr. FISH. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Green.

Mr. FISH. I shall have to differ with the gentleman. Mr. Green has nothing to do with it whatever.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. It is a long time since I have given any special study to this particular question, and I assume the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF] has, but my understanding is that an act of Congress insofar as it is in conflict with a treaty abrogates the provisions of the treaty, and certainly it would seem that these trade agreements, which are made without ratification by the Senate or either branch of Congress would be abrogated by a definite provision of an act of Congress. Is that the gentleman's understanding?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Yes; but I call the gentleman's attention to this fact. It is human nature not to be neutral. We take sides for or against every question that is brought before us. The World War demonstrated that thoroughly. The Italian-Ethiopian conflict demonstrated it again, and right now there is the situation in Spain which is once more demonstrating that fact. We take sides one way or the other.

Mr. MAPES. I do not raise any question about that.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. The gentleman is taking my time, and I have only 2 minutes left. The difficulty is that when you have racial conflict you have a great urge upon the part of people from various races to bring pressure to bear on Members of Congress, on the administration, on the State Department. You are constantly confronted with this racial discrimination for or against some belligerent, and as a result no matter what you do, you are accused of not being neutral, of violating the neutral rights and laws and regulations.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I cannot yield any more. We realize that neutrality legislation does not prevent war. We realize that human nature is just the same whether you pass legislation or not; but the thing that we want to do, in my judgment, is to serve notice on all the world in advance what the rules of the game are, what we believe them to be, and that we will live up to them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I take this minute for the purpose of saying that I would not take issue with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF] about the tendency of human nature to take sides, but it did seem to me that the question of the effect of this legislation on trade agreements was left hanging in the air by the debate on Friday, and I am afraid that the gentleman from Wisconsin has still left it hanging in the air. My question was directed particularly to the effect of this legislation on trade agreements or any other treaties that might be made.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute. One of the reasons I have advocated that this resolution should not be made permanent legislation beyond the shipment and sale of arms, ammunition, and implements of war is the fact that we have given no real consideration in the Committee to the effect its provisions would have on our trade treaties. I believe they violate them, and I do not want to vote in this House to violate any trade or commercial treaty. I propose to limit the power to place embargoes on commodities other than arms not to exceed 1 year, so that we can find out the facts. I am not positive, but I do believe that the resolution violates our trade treaties.

I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago there was an argument between the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KLOEB] as to who made the reciprocal-trade agreements. The gentleman from New York thought they were made by one man and the gentleman from Ohio thought they were made by another man. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that no one knows who makes the reciprocal-trade agreements, and no one can find out who makes them. The principal work of making those agreements is supposed to be done by a committee called the Committee for Foreign Trade Agreements, but the personnel of that committee has never been published or otherwise divulged, and I have the statement of the chairman of the Committee for Foreign Trade Agreements that the personnel of that committee has never been made public. No one at any time can find out who makes these trade agreements.

The Committee on Trade Agreements is a committee without a definite or fixed personnel. It is ordinarily composed of officers from the Departments of State, Commerce, Treasury, and Agriculture and of the Tariff Commission. But these officers are designated from time to time by the heads of their departments, and the personnel is changed from time to time by the department heads according to the nature of the treaty or trade agreement under discussion. Representatives of other departments and agencies are also represented from time to time on this committee, but the names of none of the members of the committee are ever made public. The making of a foreign-trade agreement is shrouded in absolute secrecy. Those who make the treaties cannot only not be approached by the public, but the public cannot even find out who they are.

Mr. FISH. I assure the gentleman it is not Mr. Green. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, when the learned chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee said Friday in debate upon the House floor, as quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2157:

> I am not objecting to any American citizen protesting against legislation, but when we have men here in the departments that undertake to dictate to the Members of this House and denounce legislation in which they are not concerned, then I say that such people, every one of them, ought to be fired, and I believe this House will agree with me.

I, for one, do not agree; and I find that my position is amply supported by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, by the development of English liberties as they historically originated in England from the Magna Carta, through the Petition of Right, up through the Bill of Rights, and into the Constitution under the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, which are all in support of my contention that the learned gentleman, who is the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, is wrong in his statement. My position further is supported by all legal and historical writers since the beginning of parliamentary government.

Are these employees of the Government not to be considered as American citizens? Are they going to be denied the rights of free speech, free press, free assembly merely because the biggest single employer, Uncle Sam, is their boss? Are we going to deny these employees these rights who now, because they live in the District, have not the right of franchise? Are we going to deny them the last right, namely, the right of petition and assemblage, the denial of which, by King George III, "taxation without representation", caused the Revolutionary War? Would the learned gentleman and the Members of this House desire to adopt the position that the employees of the Government should do only as we tell them, say only what we say they can say, in abrogation of their clear constitutional right to assemble and petition Congress, while at the same time, as an administration, you have favored the employees of private industrial unions of their own choosing as against the company unions? Does this House mean to imply that the unions representing the employees of the Federal Government are company unions? A mere collection of "yes men" for Congressmen and Senators? Does this House mean to imply that the employees of the United States Government have sold their constitutional rights for a job? Does this House mean to imply that this Government is trying to build a great machine of humanity, no member of which machine shall have the right but to vote "aye", as in some of the Fascist nations of today, where to vote "no" means the concentration camp?

When the learned chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee on Friday said, "Then I say that such people—Government employees—every one of them, should be fired, and I believe this House will agree with me", spoke without having in mind the historical growth of the civil liberties of the English and American people. I desire to call to the attention of this House, first, the forcing of King John to sign the first charter of English liberties on the banks of the Running Mead River, at Runnymede, June 15, 1215, which Magna Carta guaranteed certain rights to the nobles of England and the people they represented at that time. King John was so incensed at the curtailment of regal power that he went back to his castle and spent several days venting his spleen by chewing on pieces of wood.

Then there were consecutively the following grants of liberties to the English people, always wrung from a reluctant monarch by force: Edward's statutes, 1275; the Petition of Rights, 1628; the act for trial by jury, 1670; the Habeas Corpus Act, 1679; the Bill of Rights, 1688; and the acts of settlement, 1701. And all through the fabric of these acts ran the thread of right of assembly and the right to petition the monarch, and which, after Parliament was created, became the right to petition Parliament.

For instance, I quote the wording of the Bill of Rights of 1688, which was signed by William and Mary, King and Queen of England:

> That it is the right of the subjects to petition the King, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning are illegal.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts adopted a declaration of rights, clause 19:

> The people have a right in an orderly and peaceable manner to assemble to consult upon the common good; give instructions to their representatives; and to request of the legislative body, by the way of addresses, petitions, or remonstrances, redress of the wrongs done them, and of the grievances they suffer.

Nor were the Thirteen Colonies satisfied with the Constitution of the United States until they had an opportunity to adopt as the first 10 amendments to the Constitution the Bill of Rights. I wish to point out that this first amendment was not a new thought to the founding fathers of the Nation but was merely a codification of an idea that was already over 500 years old among the English people. I quote amendment no. 1:

Congress shall make no laws respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble; and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

Some of the Colonies did not ratify the Constitution until these provisions were in it. They were not so sure of the Constitution but they were sure of the Bill of Rights. This relationship of the citizen to his king or his ruler and to his Parliament or his Congress is a singular relationship and is one that cannot be curbed. I quote Mr. Justice Brandeis from his concurring opinion in Whitney against California, United States Supreme Court, May 16, 1927:

Those who won our independence believed that the final end of the state was to make men free to develop their faculties, and that in its government the deliberative forces should prevail over the arbitrary. They believed liberty to be the secret of happiness and courage to be the secret of liberty. They believed that freedom to think as you will and to speak as you think are means indispensable to the discovery and spread of political truth; that without free speech and assembly discussion would be futile; that with them discussion affords ordinarily adequate protection against the dissemination of noxious doctrine; that the greatest menace to freedom is an inert people; that public discussion is a political duty; and that this should be a fundamental principle of the American Government. They recognized the risks to which all human institutions are subject. But they knew that order cannot be secured merely through fear of punishment for its infraction; that it is hazardous to discourage thought, hope, and imagination; that fear breeds repression; that repression breeds hate; that hate menaces stable government; that the path of safety lies in the opportunity to discuss freely supposed grievances and proposed remedies; and that the fitting remedy for evil counsels is good ones. Believing in the power of reason as applied through public discussion, they eschewed silence coerced by law—the argument of force in its worst form. Recognizing the occasional tyrannies of governing majorities, they amended the Constitution so that free speech and assembly should be guaranteed.

Further affirming this unique constitutional and age-old right of this Government of an employee or employees to assemble and to petition their Congress, I quote from United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S. Repts. 552):

The right of the people peaceably to assemble existed long before the adoption of the Constitution. * * * In fact it has always been one of the attributes of citizenship under a free government. It "derives its source", to use the language of Chief Justice Marshall in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1), from those laws whose authority is acknowledged by civilized man throughout the world. It is found wherever civilization exists. * * * The right was not created by the amendment; neither was its continuance guaranteed, except as against Congressional interference. * * * But the right to assemble for petitioning Congress or anything else connected with the National Government is an attribute of national citizenship, and as such under the protection of and guarantee by the United States.

And now, Mr. Chairman, and the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Members of this House, when I attempted to defend Friday the telegram of protest sent to this Congress, which telegram does not object to the whole McReynolds bill, but only one part of it, as a Member of Congress I wanted to protect this unique, unalienable, age-old right of assembly and petition, of which right "the right of free press" is a modern outgrowth and a part of the concurrent right of free speech. It is a right that is an instinct of man, a social instinct of man to assemble to talk over troubles and to seek a plan of common action, and it is a part of the Federal Constitution itself which was written by a little group of revolutionary willful men who themselves assembled.

Further, the learned chairman says:

But when we have men here in the departments that undertake to dictate to the Members of this House and denounce legislation in which they are not concerned, then I say that such people, every one of them, ought to be fired.

I wish to call to the attention of the Chairman of the Committee that a neutrality bill deals with peace and war. It is not a political question of party against party, but one of deepest interest to every citizen, including the Government employees of the District of Columbia, who during the World War made the following personal contributions: 27,318 soldiers serving under arms from the District of Columbia, of whom 733 were casualties and 202 died on the battlefields of that war.

These Government employees are American citizens within the meaning of the Constitution, and certainly have an interest in their Government. Although ordinarily they are the servants and Congress is the master, yet there is also the relationship, as in the present incident, where they are the masters and we, as Congress, are the servants. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY] 12 minutes.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] for the fine statement he made the other day that this was not a partisan question. We have before us for discussion one of the greatest questions that has ever come before the Congress of the United States. I take the floor in opposition to giving the President such great discretionary power as is proposed in the McReynolds bill.

Mr. Chairman, although this is not a war-profits bill, the whole basis of argument and dissension is found in that section of the various bills which affects trade and profits during periods when we remain neutral and other nations fight. We can take for granted that we all want peace. We all know that everyone wants to make profits when it is possible to do so. We face the fact that there exists a strong desire for profits which can be made while we are at peace and other nations are at war. We must answer only one question, "Do we want profits more than we want peace?"

You are all familiar with the provisions of section 4 of both the McReynolds and Pittman bills, and you are equally familiar with the provisions of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] as a substitute for section 4 in those bills. Those three formulas do not constitute the only roads by which we may reach our goal, although every attempt has been made to make it so appear. As a substitute for the three plans submitted thus far I am offering an amendment in the form of a substitute section. My section will do four things—

First. It will provide a mandatory cash-and-carry policy based upon modern conditions of warfare.

Second. It will provide the strongest possible barrier against our being drawn into another foreign war.

Third. It will give the widest possible protection to our foreign trade during periods of neutrality without endangering American peace.

Fourth. It provides a policy whereby we can maintain our neutrality instead of setting up a policy, the operation of which would force us to fight to protect the policy.

I want to read the amendment which I will offer:

SEC. 4. (a) Whenever the President shall have issued the proclamation as provided in section 3 of this act, thereafter it shall be unlawful for any American person to retain or assert any right, title, or interest in any article or commodity exported by sea from the United States to any port or place which can be reached only by traversing those waters adjacent to a belligerent state which are within the zone of belligerent operations as determined by the President, and no such right, title, or interest shall be recognized by the Government of the United States or by any court or by any officer of the United States, and any contract for the insurance of risks on any article or commodity so exported, or any American interest therein, or any American vessel carrying such article or commodity, shall be null and void and unenforceable in any court of the United States.

(b) When in the judgment of the President the conditions which have caused him to issue the proclamation as provided in section 3 of this act shall have ceased to exist, he shall revoke the same and the provisions of this section shall thereupon cease to apply.

It seems impossible that there could be any misinterpretation or misconstruction of that section. It provides: First, a mandatory cash-and-carry policy on exports of articles and commodities, other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war, if—now get this—those exports go by sea to any ports which can be reached only by traversing zones adjacent to belligerent nations which are within the zone of belligerent operations. Second, it divests any American person of all right, title, and interest in cargo or vessel entering such zones of belligerent operations.

My proposal does not give any discretionary power to the President whereby he could forbid exports of such articles and commodities as he might see fit, or whereby he might permit the exportation of articles and commodities to belligerent war zones under the protection of the American flag and backed by the guns of the American Navy. It does not rob us of all intercourse with our neighbor, Canada, and does not deprive us of our trade with other neutral nations. It does not abnegate the principles of the Monroe Doctrine by placing any American state upon the same basis as a European or non-American state.

Before I make any actual comparisons of the provisions of my plan with those submitted previously in this debate, I want to again state some principles of modern warfare which some of the gentlemen seem to have quite overlooked. First, the power of declaring what is and what is not contraband or limited contraband rests solely in the hands of the nation or nations at war. No power which we can give our President could or would enable him to make these distinctions. The nations at war formulate their contraband and limited contraband lists solely from the standpoint of self-interest and self-preservation. For proof of these facts I call to your attention the list of contraband and noncontraband formulated by Great Britain in the World War. That list will be found on pages 2175 to 2176 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 12, 1937. Second, the principles of the "freedom of the seas", which are so much talked about, have not found their place in the practice of warring nations. I call to your attention that only once in history has Great Britain recognized that "free ships make free goods", that "neutral goods on belligerent vessels retain their neutral character" and that "a blockade to be legal must be effective." Those principles were recognized by Great Britain in the Declaration of Paris in 1856, but in the World War, the first test of their application, Great Britain discarded them just as did every other nation at war. The only way we could secure wartime agreement to those principles would be for us to lick all the naval powers. Third, regardless of the strength of our navy, we cannot convoy and protect our merchantmen in war zones located more than 3,000 miles from our bases of operation while those merchantmen and naval craft are subjected to restraints placed upon them by navies and aircraft operating from nearby bases.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS] correctly stated that if we adopted the Pittman bill we would completely cut ourselves off from Canada in the event that Canada, as a part of the British Empire, became an active participant in a war of the British Empire. Such a policy would work intense hardships upon our Northern States, and would be a complete surrender of the principle of inter-American solidarity. No good purpose would be achieved by cutting ourselves off from Canada, because our trade would not be endangered, the lives of our nationals would not be endangered, and the continuance of normal trade with our northern neighbor would not place us in a position whereby our rights as a neutral nation would be jeopardized.

A nation at war does not seek to cut off trade between neutral nations. That was evidenced by the action taken by both sides in the World War. Germany established a war zone in the entire North Sea, but provided lanes through which neutral vessels might reach neutral ports with their cargoes. Great Britain did not cut us off from trading with the neutral Scandinavian countries, although she did limit exports to those countries upon a quota basis. That quota arrangement was to restrict importations to normal amounts in order to prevent transshipment to Germany and her allies.

If this House insists on writing a neutrality bill which will place Canada in the same position as non-American powers, we might as well quit. Just consider what would happen to an American neutrality policy of that kind in the event that Canada became a zone of belligerent operations in a war between Canada and some non-American power. All the king's horses and all the king's men could not keep us out of that war. Our national safety would be endangered and we would find ourselves a nation of realists instead of a nation of idealists. Our conduct toward Canada must at all times be based upon an understanding of the ties of the good neighbor, which so strongly exist, and upon the economic ties that bind our nations together. True neutrality need not wreck those bonds or destroy that friendship.

In conclusion, let me set forth the reasons why we should not include wide discretionary powers in the hands of the President. I love and trust our great Chief Executive, and know his sincerity when he said, "I hate war." We may always have equally pacific Presidents. But neither the Presidents of the past, present, or future have made or will make any claims of infallibility. Granting of wide discretionary powers places within the hands of one human being the possibilities of rendering one false decision that would not only wreck the spirit of neutrality but would plunge us into war. President Wilson was sincere in his desires for peace, and at the outset was firmly opposed to allowing our citizens to make loans to belligerent nations.

We are all well aware of the change which took place in that policy—a change which in a thousand ways paved the road to war. There is another side to this question. Under the provisions of the Pittman and McReynolds bills the President is given the power to forbid the export of such articles and commodities as he may see fit in order that we may retain our national security and protect our national interests. No two nations need the same commodities to the same extent. If we prohibit the transport and sale of a commodity needed more by one warring nation than by the other we are discriminating against the nation whose need is the greatest. For example, say that Great Britain and France were at war and we placed a Presidential embargo on cotton. The British fleet would pick up cotton in all her colonies where cotton is grown and the French would be isolated from cotton supplies. The same thing is true of any article or commodity which you could name. Let us be perfectly honest and see what the reaction would be in this country toward the exercise of such powers by the President. Suppose that cotton, copper, oil, and steel were placed upon the list of commodities which could not be exported, and wheat, corn, and meats were left off. Instantly great sections of our country would protest this discrimination against their products, while the products of other sections could freely enter the channels of world trade. Human nature is not a perfect organism, and the very imperfect nature of the organism would bring about such protests. I know full well what the wheat raisers would think if wheat was barred and cotton was left open to trade.

Neutrality is a condition or state of being whereby a nation remains at peace while other nations are at war. There are only two kinds of neutrality—the perfect one whereby we treat all belligerents alike, and the other imperfect one whereby we refrain from actual participation in the war but aid one side to the detriment of the other. Discretionary powers which offer every possibility of imperfect neutrality cannot help but put us in a position whereby our neutrality is endangered.

If we are to avoid another war and are to enjoy the blessings of a permanent peace, our Neutrality Act must be strong. If we are to prevent the loss of our citizens' lives and the destruction of our property at sea, we must keep our citizens and property out of danger. If we are to be fair and neutral, we must treat all warring nations alike, without fear or favor and without a surrender of our principles. The section that I propose will do all of that. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY] his expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. AMLIE].

Mr. AMLIE. Mr. Chairman, I was rather amused a few days ago when I read a special article in the New York Times of Thursday, March 11. This article tells about a special committee coming to this country from England, a sort of a self-constituted parliamentary group coming here to find out what the United States thinks of the British Empire.

This article indicates that they are particularly concerned about trade relations with the United States in the event of war. The mission states it represents the so-called imperial policy group, which consists of no more than 30 conservative members of Parliament.

This article goes on to say that the British Government is considerably worried about this delegation coming over here, and the article states that—

> The British Government has other reasons for distrusting a public Anglo-American love feast at this time. The Foreign Office here has learned through bitter experience never to express joy at any action of the United States Congress or Government, for any sign of official pleasure in London is a signal for suspicion in the United States Senate.
> Now that United States neutrality policy is shaping up so perfectly from the British viewpoint, it is certainly inopportune—so officials here argue—for an unofficial group to pose as ambassadors of good will in the United States, to make speeches about Britain's desire for closer relations and perhaps even mention neutrality or war debts.
> The British Government fears that some unconsidered utterance by an irresponsible individual may remind the American public how much Britain appreciates the pending "cash and carry" neutrality bill and how convenient it would be to this country in the event of war.

I think we might as well recognize that this bill is a measure that will be particularly welcome as far as England and Japan are concerned. They control the seas. Moreover, citizens of Great Britain own what has been estimated to be $7,000,000,000 worth of property and securities in this country, which, in time of war, could be converted into dollar exchange. We are faced with the fact that if we are really interested in neutrality we must be prepared to pay the price.

I have read with a great deal of satisfaction a speech made on the floor of this House last Friday by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW]. He mentions the fact that we are interested in neutrality but we are only interested in paying 50 cents on a $25 premium.

I want to take one commodity merely to illustrate what I have in mind. In a highly industrialized nation there is very little difference between actual munitions of war and cotton. It is a simple process to convert cotton into guncotton. There is very little difference between selling cotton to Italy or selling ammunition to the Loyalist Government of Spain. Still the Federal Government lends its aid to the former and prohibits the latter. Now we find, with the preparations going on in European countries in anticipation of another world war, that the purchase of raw materials here is stimulating prices, and many people in this country have come to feel that they have a very direct interest in continuing trade with these various countries. If we are going to prevent people in the cotton States from selling cotton to any of the warring parties, then we must be prepared to reimburse these people for any loss that they may sustain. It is obviously unfair to tell people in cotton States that they cannot benefit from trading with Japan or England or any other country able to come here and purchase cotton on a cash-and-carry basis; but, just the same, to sell an industrial country cotton, or to sell an industrially undeveloped country munitions of war and ammunition is pretty much the same thing. In this country during the past few years under the present administration we have, for instance, tried to make use of some of our surplus cotton. Not long ago we had some 90 Government-operated factories trying to utilize a part of these four or five million bales of cotton for the purpose of converting this cotton into mattresses to be used for the unemployed.

Immediately private manufacturers bore down on Washington and demanded that those factories be closed. The argument they used was that the Government was putting real cotton into those mattresses instead of cotton linters; that those mattresses would last 15 or 20 years instead of 4 or 5 years, which was the average length of life for 90 percent of the mattresses made by the private trade. As a result of this pressure, these 90 factories were very promptly closed.

Now, it seems to me that we have to face this problem. What has happened to the use of cotton for the making of mattresses for the unemployed has happened to virtually every other attempt to use our great abundance of natural resources for the benefit of our unemployed. All attempts to bring the unemployed in touch with natural resources or raw materials have been opposed by businessmen who feel that such attempts constitute competition with private industry by the Government; and in the face of this opposition from business the New Deal has obligingly dropped these projects. To loan foreign nations $12,000,000,000, that will never be repaid, for the purpose of buying our surplus of finished goods and raw materials to be destroyed in war is regarded as sound American policy. But any proposition that calls for the expenditure of this same amount of money for the purchase of these same goods and using them to increase the living standards of our own people is generally regarded as subversive and un-American.

If we are not to use these goods for the raising of the living standards of the American people, there is obviously no choice save to sell them to nations either in war or preparing for war, or to permit them to remain here to glut our own markets. We could, of course, try to make of this bill a mandatory neutrality bill by placing what would amount to a virtual embargo on trade with warring nations. But, as I have tried to indicate, this would place the whole cost of an adequate neutrality policy upon people and upon sections of the country that are unable to bear it. Already the frantic war preparations of the great military powers has created a tremendous demand for cotton. The cotton-producing States are naturally determined to reap any benefits in the form of higher prices that result from this demand. The Representatives in Congress from those States would naturally object to a neutrality act that would again create a glut in the cotton market in this country. It is obviously impossible to get real neutrality legislation when a situation is permitted to develop where the immediate choice is between war trade or economic ruin. It is still possible to prevent the situation resolving itself down to this choice, but there is no time to lose. A far-reaching program must be launched for raising the living standards of the underprivileged one-third of our people of whom the President has spoken. It would take all our surpluses of finished goods and raw materials for many years to come. Under such an arrangement the producers of these raw materials could be paid cost of production.

Such a plan would be expensive, but it would not be as expensive as war. It is the price that we must be prepared to pay if we want to stay out of war. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in this neutrality bill. In my humble judgment, next to the reorganization of the Federal judiciary as recommended by the President of the United States, there is no other question of such importance.

I am also interested in the arguments which have been made in this debate by certain Members of the House, especially those who have opposed the speech made by the distinguished chairman of this committee, in connection with the telegram sent to him by the Social Security Board Union. I yield to no one in this House in my reverence for the Bill of Rights, but it strikes me that employees have gone far afield when they send a telegram of the kind read into the RECORD by the gentleman from Tennessee. It comes with poor grace and obviously will be given little or no consideration. Those who have attempted to answer the argument made by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee fell far short of the mark. This case could be titled "Constitutional Privilege Versus Loyalty." I prefer to support the theory of loyalty. I undertake to say that if the employees in the offices of the gentlemen, who have spoken with so much feeling against the position of the chairman of the committee and who complain so bitterly about the violation of constitutional rights would go into executive session tonight and come out with a resolution condemning some piece of legislation these gentlemen are sponsoring on the floor of the House, and then send a copy of their resolution to the press as well as to the committee that has jurisdiction, you and I know what would happen to those employees. Or would these same gentlemen with such warm enthusiasm for freedom of speech and right of petition commend their employees for boldly standing upon their constitutional rights and then increase their pay? Assume that these same gentlemen had the power to appoint postmasters in their own congressional districts all of whom are under civil service and further assume these postmasters met in convention assembled and passed a resolution denouncing bills which had been introduced by these distinguished Members of Congress. Then follow this one further step by assuming that the condemnatory resolution was given to the press and to the proper committee in this House.

I am certain that these gentlemen through their bigness of heart and their zeal for the right of petition would appoint all of these postmasters for life, when their present term expires.

This presents a serious problem of loyalty to those responsible for their position. These cases are almost analogous to the one at bar. If insolent bureaucrats in these departments are going to start petitioning Congress upon every conceivable question and we approve such tactics, then we as Congressmen might just as well abdicate.

Mr. Chairman, when I think of neutrality I think of peace, and when I think of peace my mind travels back to November 11, 1918, a day which brought to a close the most deadly and costly conflict which civilization has ever known. Under the smoking and smoldering ruins of that world catastrophe lay thousands upon thousands of America's most heroic and noble men. They fought, they charged, they fell, and were lost in that sea of dead humanity, leaving this world in the interests of a Nation which decreed in the long ago that life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness should never be jeopardized, even on the high seas of the world, by the hands of a foreign foe. Yes, freedom of the seas is an American policy which has been firmly embedded in our governmental structure since our inception as a nation. In the advancement of American civilization and progress this policy has played a glorious and independent part, notwithstanding its cost in blood and gold. Under the pending bill, as I view it, however, America charts a new course. America does an about-face, and rightfully so, because when we consider what is going on across the Atlantic at this particular time, when we know how the European nations have failed to take cognizance of the uselessness and futility of war, we have a right to pursue the course we are taking under this neutrality bill.

When we look across the Atlantic we know that every European nation is armed to the teeth, with more men, more guns, more ships, more temper, and more disposition toward war than they had in 1914, when the World War commenced. Ominous war clouds hang over Europe at this particular time, and that is the chief reason why public sentiment is almost unanimous in telling Members of Congress to do everything within their power to keep us out of another European brawl.

Under these circumstances, if we forget the policies and precedents of yesterday, we have a right to adopt policies and precedents that are in keeping with the spirit of the day. In my opinion, this bill is a sober and durable triumph of cold American reason and logic over an outmoded policy under which for a period of 150 years private interests have been protected by the beneficent arm of a grateful Government. The time has come when private interests and some national pride must be submerged in the interest of public necessity and national demand.

Another point I want to discuss is that part of the bill where the President of the United States shall have the right, if he finds it necessary, to keep American citizens from sailing upon belligerent ships. The bill says when that proclamation is issued, then any American has no right to violate it; and, Mr. Chairman, if that policy had been in force and effect in 1917, in my humble judgment, our neutrality upon the high seas would not have been violated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would it not be sufficient if the bill provided that should an American citizen travel upon a belligerent merchant vessel he automatically surrendered his right to rely upon the Government for protection? Why make it an illegal act, to be punished as a crime?

Mr. LUCAS. I think the gentleman is probably correct, and I believe that in the event an American citizen travels upon a belligerent ship he should do so at his own responsibility and at his own risk. I think that is exactly what will happen if this bill passes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not read the bill that way.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is in error, and I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. LUCAS. Certainly, if it is illegal to travel upon a belligerent vessel and in violation of such law, a citizen so traveling does so upon his own responsibility and, in my opinion, waives all right to rely upon the Government for protection.

Mr. FISH. I may say to the gentleman I propose to offer an amendment to remedy that situation.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, I made bold by saying if the policy which is expressed in this bill had been in effect in 1917 our neutrality upon the high seas would not have been violated; at least, our citizens would not have been on the Lusitania, which went down along with a lot of arms and ammunition. That incident was responsible for the declaration of war by the President of the United States in 1917 against Germany and her allies.

It was commonly understood at the time we declared war on Germany that we were also going into the war for the purpose of making the world safe for democracy. I want to debate for just a moment another point along that line which is important to me, and it is one of the reasons why I am for this bill.

Woodrow Wilson, then President of the United States, spent many interesting moments of those fighting days believing that ultimately the universal dream of peace on earth, good will to men, was going to be accomplished. We all know that. Yet that sky line of idealism received its first awakening and first shock when he sat around the peace table at Versailles and was treated by Old World diplomats with contemptuous pleasantry. You and I know that honest and sincere statesmanship sat around that table attempting to bind up the wounds of a bleeding world, only to be overpowered by intriguing, static, and disingenuous statesmen, who in one hand held the olive branch of peace, good will, and equity, while in the other hand they held a sharp dagger and the shining stiletto. Yes; it was at that conference that those around the peace table gave to President Wilson the kiss of Judas, which was the start of a series of international events that sent that great man to a premature grave.

Passage of this bill will be a partial vindication of the principles of that man as I see it. In other words, he attempted to make the world safe for democracy, and this is a bill which attempts to make the best part of the universe safe for democracy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. Just for a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like to get the gentleman's opinion on one matter. Does the gentleman believe any other nation will follow our example in the passage of legislation of this sort?

Mr. LUCAS. No, I do not. European nations have learned absolutely nothing as a result of the World War. We have been continuously preparing for another war. They continuously exhibit a militaristic spirit. In addition to this, our geographical situation is entirely different from theirs.

Mr. Chairman, I am duty bound to support this bill because of the thousands upon thousands of comrades of mine who today are in the hospitals still suffering from the diseases and ravages of war; that crowd of fellows who today are looking through windows of sunshine and seeing nothing but clouds of darkness; that group of fellows who went into war believing in the ideals of the then Commander in Chief of this great American Army of ours. I am duty bound to support this bill because of my solemn and sacred interest in the widows and orphans of those who went down fighting believing they were giving their all in a war to end all wars. I am fighting for the memory of those men and the belief they had in their Commander in Chief at that time.

Mr. Chairman, one day I stood in the beautiful cemetery at Suresnes and I looked to the outskirts of Paris and to the north, where men of all nations had fought and died, and all about me were the uniform rows of white crosses, telling a simple story of how 1,500 American boys had reached their journey's end. A little while thereafter I stood on the north slope of Belleau Wood and gazed out across the broad expanse of hills and valleys, and as that panorama unfolded before me I was grimly conscious of man's inhumanity to man. At the base of that slope lie 2,200 American boys, which tells another story of 26 continuous and victorious days of fighting in a struggle which has few paralleis in the battle of life and death. As I stood there in that atmosphere of immortality, the famous words of Col. John McCrae came tumbling in upon every wave of thought:

> If ye break faith with us who die,
> We shall not sleep though poppies grow
> In Flanders' fields.

And so once again I reconsecrated my hopes anew and made a further pledge that when I returned to my native land I should be more militant and diligent in keeping the faith with these men who died that liberty might endure by using all of the power and persuasion at my command upon any and every occasion toward the outlawry of war. And I am happy to say at this moment that I have kept the faith. I believe I have measured up to that sacred spiritual charge. And today my vote, the most important one since my becoming a Member of Congress, will be the crowning achievement of my activities along this line.

Mr. Chairman, I am not unmindful of the arguments presented against this bill, and there is some merit in most of them. I appreciate that there are those who contend that this is a "scuttle and run" measure under which the President of the United States has been granted too much discretionary power. There are those who argue for mandatory provisions, but the futility of being too explicit or being placed in a strait jacket is found in the failure of being able to anticipate what is going to happen in the future. And then again, what is contraband in peace and what is contraband in war depends in a great measure upon the attitude of the mind. Neutrality from our viewpoint may be one thing, while neutrality to a belligerent nation may be another. And unless authority and faith is lodged in one man to meet the complicated and intriguing problems as they arise, we strip the bill of its real importance when considered in the light of our national safety and security from becoming embroiled in a foreign war.

There are those who believe that England, Japan, and France, because of their large navies and submarine forces, have a distinct advantage under this bill and that the rest of the European and Asiatic countries will feel sorely grieved by this discrimination and will seek to retaliate in one form or another.

There are those who believe that war will be brought closer to American shores as a result of the "cash and carry" plan as exhibited in the bill.

And, lastly, there is that selfish, greedy, unpatriotic group who have always rated property and materials higher than human life.

My colleagues, all of these arguments against the bill fade into insignificance when the true benefits of the measure are considered. I can visualize this measure becoming a real bulwark of national defense. Of course, this measure is not perfect, and no neutrality bill will ever be. Yet to me it is the most potent weapon yet designed to stop a war before it starts. This forward-looking piece of legislation will do more to keep us out of the endless, futile, and tragic wars of Europe than all of the previous negotiations, agreements, and laws written by American statesmen and diplomats. My hope is that the vote on the bill will be almost unanimous. Such support upon a measure affecting the world will advise European nations courteously yet firmly that America wants no part of another ghastly and European devastating war. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, whatever I may say today on the pending bill to establish a neutrality policy for this country may be of little moment but I want to be on record. In years to come this measure will furnish delicious humor and stir the funnybone of history students who may have the patience and fortitude to dig through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for light upon contemporary affairs. No doubt they will chortle a little that the same Congress which considered a billion dollar defense Budget also considered a neutrality bill. They will be intrigued by the naive distinctions between "arms, ammunition, and implements of war" in one section of the measure and "other articles and materials" in another section, as if wheat and cotton and pork chops and frozen beef and automobiles are no less essential to the winning of a war than machine guns, hand grenades, gas masks, and high-explosive shells. They will read section 5 (a) of the bill which makes it unlawful for any person in this country to buy, sell, or exchange the bonds, obligations, or securities of some foreign belligerent and then read section 4 (a), which makes the shipment of "articles or materials in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war" unlawful only if the President so proclaims, and then ask, "What's the difference?" This distinction between "articles or materials" in one section and the evidences of articles or materials in the form of bonds, obligations, or securities in another section should stir the whimsical fancy of future history students and international lawyers as nothing else could do. And so I want to be on record, full appreciative of the fact that my own views are perhaps somewhat unorthodox.

I am sure the committee has made a sincere effort to bring in a bill that meets with general approval. No doubt it represents a considerable viewpoint throughout the Nation. My own notion of this measure, however, might best be described in the language of a testimonial that President Lincoln once wrote for a man who had invented a mousetrap and who believed that his fortune was made if he could secure an endorsement of the President. By way of endorsement, Lincoln wrote:

> For the sort of people who want this sort of thing, this is the sort of thing that sort of people will want.

In that spirit, I can only say that for the sort of people who want this kind of a neutrality policy, this is the sort of neutrality policy that sort of people will want.

It stirs no enthusiasm in me. We are still attempting to eat our cake and have it, too. We say we want neutrality, but along with it we want a slice of the profitable trade of belligerent nations. We want peace, provided it occasions no sacrifice of profit. We want to keep out of foreign conflicts but we insist on preserving the traditional freedom of the seas so that foreign belligerents may be supplied with our goods and that our factories and ships might be kept busy. It is the old profit lure, and perhaps the best answer is that if some of our ships had been tied up during the last war there would not now be so many idle ships and so many millions of unemployed in our land. It is our very apparent unwillingness to sacrifice profits which has inspired such ingenious subterfuges as the "cash and carry" policy in the Senate bill or the "shippers' risk" policy enunciated by others. We want neutrality but we refuse to forego profit or make any sacrifices to get it, and that means that we do not want neutrality very strongly.

Nor does the "discretionary" powers conferred upon the President in this bill have much appeal. The discretionary road is the road to war, not away from war. When nations are maddened by the hysteria of war and the propaganda mills are at work, sober and temperate judgment is well nigh impossible. Nations are like the Arkansas farmer who was asked why he did not repair the roof on his barn. His answer was, "When it rains I cain't, and when it don't, it don't need it." These discretionary powers will be invoked only in the case of war, and then their exercise in a temperate and discreet manner is virtually impossible.

Have we forgotten 1914? We proclaimed neutrality, and when France sought a hundred million loan from our private bankers, Secretary Bryan insisted that it would be in violation of our neutral position. Bryan relinquished the portfolio of State to Lansing; and when the French sought credit arrangements for the purpose of buying American goods, a policy of temporizing began. Lansing persuaded President Wilson that while loans were wrong, credits were quite all right. Once these credits were established, we began to taste the delights of artificial prosperity. Factories worked overtime. Wages went up. Our industrial plant was expanded to keep abreast of demand. Our tillable acreage was increased. Farm commodities went up. It was a beautiful dream while it lasted. Our foreign trade increased by several billion dollars.

Then came pay day. Obviously our belligerent customers had no gold with which to pay, and if payment were demanded there would be an industrial collapse. Insistence on payment would mean idle factories, unemployment, deflation. There was a way out. As expressed by Lansing, it is only too persuasive as to how nations when caught in the hysteria of war do not and cannot exercise discretion and independent judgment.

Can we afford—

to let a declaration as to our conception of the true spirit of neutrality, made in the first days of the war, stand in the way of our national interest, which seems to be seriously threatened?

There it was. The national interest. The profit interest. What matter that men butchered each other on the battlefields of Europe to make the world safe for democracy? The important thing was to preserve our national interest; and so the inevitable happened. The policy of not making loans was thrown into the discard, and shortly thereafter the first half billion dollar loan was negotiated through a Morgan syndicate.

Soon it became apparent that our banking houses could not keep the allied nations supplied with money. It required more money than they could raise. What was necessary was for the credit of the United States to be placed behind the war. It was an intimation that our Government must now come to the rescue and make Government loans to the Allies. Those loans, let it be said, are still over there today, and the prospect of collection is slim indeed. But that is neither here nor there. It was but a step from throwing our dollars into the struggle until we became involved as a participant. The 6th of next month will mark the twentieth anniversary of our entry into that struggle.

Looming before us is a ghastly sentence from one of the messages of Ambassador Page to the State Department, that should quicken our senses if we undertake to temporize with a discretionary neutrality policy. In that message he said:

Perhaps our going to war is the only way in which our preeminent trade position can be maintained and a panic averted.

What a frightful import those words have for us today. On with carnage and destruction so long as our "preeminent trade position can be maintained." What can the proponents of a "discretionary" policy say in the light of this judgment of history?

Are we now to make possible a reenactment of these ghastly stupidities of the past by enacting a measure that in my humble opinion is a disappointment to the good people of our Nation who yearn for a policy that will insure enduring peace? I hope not.

As for those who want to "eat their cake and have it, too", in the form of a policy that brings neutrality coupled with freedom of the seas, I quote from Admiral Sims, the robust old seadog who was the commander in chief of our fighting ships during the war. He says:

We cannot keep out of war and at the same time enforce the freedom of the seas—that is, freedom to make profits out of countries in a death struggle.

That sums it up in a nutshell. It therefore becomes time to say whether we want neutrality or whether we want neutrality so long as it costs us nothing. This measure temporizes with that very fundamental question, and will earn for us the grim laughter of the historians who read about it a generation or two hence. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 51, the neutrality bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SHEPPARD, for today, on account of illness in family.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, MARCH 16, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord and Savior, we look unto Thee that we may know Thy will. We would be reminded of Thy holy word: God is love; he that loveth dwelleth in God and God in him. May we ponder Thy teaching, for herein is rooted whatever is large and grand in human life. Heavenly Father, as we look into the mirror of our current country, we see the distemperature of passion and the dominance of selfishness. We most humbly beseech Thee to be the designing and the discerning power in the midst of all hostilities. Oh, bring together the mighty forces and make them instruments of justice, happiness, and prosperity. Gracious Lord, persuade all citizens that it is their blessed, solemn, and patriotic duty to make their offering at the altar of the Republic. May we hear the command: Thou shall love the Lord Thy God with all thy heart and thy neighbor as thyself. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 329. An act to further extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead and desert-land entrymen;

S. 413. An act to create a commission and to extend further relief to water users on United States reclamation projects and on Indian irrigation projects;

S. 628. An act to provide for the construction and equipment of a building for the experiment station of the Bureau of Mines at Salt Lake City, Utah;

S. 761. An act for the relief of the State of Massachusetts;

S. 976. An act relating to labor preferences in connection with certain public-works projects;

S. 1129. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to accept from the State of Utah title to a certain State-owned section of land and to patent other land to the State in lieu thereof, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 73. Joint resolution providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art.

DR. TOWNSEND

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I introduced a resolution, which I shall call up tomorrow at the first opportunity, asking that the House join in a request of the district attorney for a suspension of the sentence imposed upon Dr. Townsend, and for the waiving of the payment of the fine.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix and to include therein an exchange of letters between the Secretary of State and myself, of interest to the cattle farmers of the country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a speech I made over the radio last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address on the policy and program of flood control which I delivered on Friday, March 12, 1937.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a statement issued yesterday by Mr. Marriner S. Eccles, Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, on the policies of the Federal Reserve Board.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, and ask the gentleman from Mississippi if he is going to do with this speech of Mr. Eccles the same as he did with Mr. Jackson's speech on the Supreme Court? The gentleman asked to revise and extend his remarks, and then put in about 2 inches of his remarks and about 2 pages of Mr. Jackson's speech, and that is contrary to the rules; and if he is going to do that, I object.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman cannot make a statement like that and get away with it.

Mr. RICH. All you have to do is to look at the RECORD and see that what I state is correct.

Mr. RANKIN. I asked permission to extend my remarks and to include therein excerpts from Mr. Jackson's speech, and I took the very excerpts published in the paper that morning and put them in the RECORD.

Mr. RICH. All the gentleman did was to refer in his own remarks to Mr. Jackson's speech and then put in two pages of it.

Mr. RANKIN. All I wanted was to put those excerpts in there that appeared in the paper.

Mr. RICH. If that is what the gentleman wants now to do in respect to Mr. Eccles' speech, then I object.

Mr. RANKIN. In the first place, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has misrepresented me on what I put in the RECORD. I put in the RECORD exactly what I got permission to put in.

Mr. RICH. I ask the gentleman if he wants to put Mr. Eccles' speech in and just refer to the speech as his own remarks.

Mr. RANKIN. I want to do exactly as I did before, except that I want to insert Mr. Eccles' entire statement in the RECORD.

Mr. RICH. Then, I object.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has misrepresented me before the House, and I want to correct him.

A few mornings ago there appeared in the paper excerpts from a statement of Hon. Robert H. Jackson, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, made before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary. I rose and asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include those excerpts from his speech. I handed them to the Clerk, and they went into the RECORD. Unfortunately Mr. Jackson's whole speech was inserted in the RECORD, in the Senate. It covers more than four pages, as will be seen by referring to page 523 of the Appendix to the RECORD.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the RECORD before him, and if he will turn to the beginning of that day's proceedings, he will see where I asked permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include excerpts from Mr. Jackson's statement. For him to rise in the House and intimate that I violated the rules of the House is a serious error. I do not propose to sit here and permit him to make that kind of a statement and have it go into the RECORD, when I carried out exactly the permission granted me by the House, and did so in good faith.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi concretely state his question of personal privilege?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes, sir. I stated it in the beginning. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] rose and made the statement that I had secured permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and had put material in the RECORD which I had no right to put there. That statement is not true.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to accuse any man falsely, and I would not. I only asked the gentleman if he intended to put in the speech of Mr. Eccles.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. May I make this statement? I do not want to accuse the gentleman of doing something falsely, nor any other Member of the House. That is the first thing. All I am trying to do is to keep the RECORD clean.

Mr. RANKIN. But he ought not to make the statement that I put material in the RECORD without having permission to do so, because I did not.

Mr. RICH. I do not believe the RECORD will show that.

Mr. RANKIN. Show what?

Mr. RICH. That you put in things that you did not have permission to. I do not think I said that. In fact, I know I did not.

Mr. RANKIN. I will leave it to the House.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think, if the gentleman will permit, there is a misunderstanding between the two gentlemen. As I understood the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], he requested that he be permitted to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the speech of Mr. Eccles.

Mr. RANKIN. No; I did not make that request.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is the way I understood the gentleman.

Mr. RANKIN. A statement by Mr. Eccles—to include a statement by Mr. Eccles.

Mr. WOODRUM. If that consent were granted, the gentleman would have a perfect right to insert the statement.

Mr. RANKIN. I understand, but that is not what we are talking about. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] rose and said I got permission to extend my remarks, and that I put in some material from the speech of Mr. Robert H. Jackson that I had no right to put in.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. As I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], he objected to your extension in which you included excerpts from the speech of Robert H. Jackson, because of your own personal comments on it. Is that not correct?

Mr. RICH. No. His request was that he wanted to put in his own remarks, and put in excerpts from a speech by Mr. Jackson.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me quote what I said on that date. It is at page 2150 of the RECORD of Friday, March 12, 1937:

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein some excerpts from a speech made by the Honorable Robert H. Jackson, Assistant Attorney General of the United States, before the Senate Committee on the Judiciary.

Then the Speaker said:

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Those excerpts were published in the paper on that date, so I merely took those excerpts and took the exact headline that was above those excerpts, which reads as follows:

Excerpts from statement of Hon. Robert H. Jackson, Assistant Attorney General of the United States before the Senate Judiciary Committee on Thursday, March 11, 1937.

Then with about 2 inches of introductory remarks, I inserted those excerpts in the RECORD exactly as I requested the right to do. I carried out exactly what the House gave me permission to do, and I am not willing for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or anybody else, to come on the floor and intimate the contrary.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, having straightened the record out, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his question of personal privilege.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next, after disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, and special orders, if any there be, I be permitted to address the House for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the majority leader what the program is going to be. If it is all right with the majority leader, I have no objection to the gentleman's speaking.

Mr. RAYBURN. If the Committee on Foreign Affairs does not finish the bill under consideration on Thursday, then it will continue on Friday until the bill is completed, and the gentleman's request would come after that. If the bill is concluded on Thursday, there is no program for Friday. The gentleman from Georgia has been wanting time, and I suggested to him, therefore, that he request permission to speak on Friday.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the program, it will probably take most of today to complete general debate. Is that correct?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is true.

Mr. SNELL. You will not probably read the bill?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Probably just the first section. We expect to read the bill for amendment on Thursday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. DEEN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for 45 minutes on Friday following the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks on the subject of the power of the press and to include therein certain explanatory excerpts and statistics thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

NEUTRALITY ACT OF 1937

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to belligerent countries; the prohibition of the transportation of arms, ammunition, and implements of war by vessels of the United States for the use of belligerent states; for the registration and licensing of persons engaged in the business of manufacturing, exporting, or importing arms, ammunition, or implements of war; and restricting travel by American citizens on belligerent ships during war", approved August 31, 1935, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 51, the neutrality bill of 1937, with Mr. WARREN in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, before beginning a discussion of the bill, I want to take cognizance of a matter that has developed in the debate and comments thereon by one or more radio news commentators.

An unwarranted and unjustified attack has been made upon the able and distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. McREYNOLDS], because in his speech upon this bill he criticized the so-called Social Security Board Union for the telegram they sent him denouncing the neutrality bill which he had introduced and which his committee had reported to the House and which we are now considering.

The critics of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], both in the House and over the radio, as critics frequently are, were uninformed as to all of the facts, the background and the character of organization which sent this denunciatory telegram, or they would have commended rather than condemned him for his utterance.

The gentleman from Tennessee usually knows the ground upon which he stands, and before he made that speech he had investigated and ascertained the source of the telegram, the character of the organization which sent it, the motives which prompted them in doing so, and of their pernicious activity, not only in this instance but a similar attack they had made, also by telegram, on the same day upon President Roosevelt and the Department of State, because our Government, in order to keep us from becoming involved in the war now going on in Spain, had refused passports to our citizens to that war-stricken country.

He had furthermore learned that this so-called union, or its officers and leaders, had, instead of practicing neutrality, been active partisans in behalf of one of the belligerents in Spain, and they were evidently more interested in that war than in writing a neutrality bill to keep our country out of war, and it was because of their zeal in that foreign war that they denounced and demanded the defeat of this bill.

The so-called Social Security Board Union is not affiliated with the American Federation of Government employees, or, as I understand, any other recognized labor organization, but it was denied a charter by that organization. In proof of this, I ask unanimous consent to read a resolution adopted at a regular meeting of the District of Columbia Department of the American Federation of Government Employees last Friday night.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The resolution is as follows:

In view of the articles appearing in today's daily papers respecting the neutrality bill, pending in the House of Representatives, I move you, sir, that the president of the department be instructed to advise Congressman SAM D. MCREYNOLDS, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee of the House of Representatives, that the group of employees purporting to represent a union in the Social Security Board are not affiliated with any recognized labor organization. The union in question was denied a charter and its temporary certificate of affiliation was canceled by the National Excutive Council of the American Federation of Government Employees, and the action of the National Executive Council was overwhelmingly sustained by the Fifth Annual Convention of the American Federation of Government Employees in Detroit, Mich., in September 1936.

CECIL E. CUSTER.
IRA Y. BAIN.

Let us assume, however, for the sake of argument, that this union of Government employees was of such a type and character that they were entitled to be and were members of the National Federation of Government Employees, and assume further that their interest in neutrality legislation was not because of their partisanship in behalf of one of the belligerents in the war in Spain, but rather an interest in legislation to keep their own country out of war—concede all this, and yet I seriously question the right, or rather the wisdom or soundness as a governmental policy in exercising such right, for the employees to have sent the telegram in question, expressed as it was in blunt and denunciatory language.

This Social Security Board Union is an organization of some of the employees of the Social Security Board of the United States, an agency of the Federal Government created by Congress to administer social-security laws in the United States; its duties are domestic and confined to citizens of the United States and has nothing whatever to do with our foreign relations, or the rights and privileges of those residing in foreign lands, and all questions pertaining thereto are wholly beyond and outside of its jurisdiction or its duties.

These employees, as citizens of the United States, have the same rights as all other citizens, including, of course, the right of petition, and this right no one, and certainly not the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, would deny them, and he so stated in his speech, but that right should be exercised as citizens and not in their official or semi-official capacity. If the matter concerned them individually, or the work in which they were engaged, or the laws which they were administering and about which they were familiar, or should be familiar, then as a group it might not be inappropriate for them as such group to make known their views, their suggestions, and requests, provided even then that they do so courteously and with the respect which should always be exercised by any employees or officers of this Government when dealing with those in another branch of the Government. But for this Government group of employees, not as individuals, but as employees of the Government, to tell the President, the Secretary of State, and the Congress which created them how to make laws or conduct the affairs of state, concerning which they are uninformed, and to do so in such a manner as to impute a want of good faith and sincerity on the part of the chairman of one of the major committees of the House, they lay themselves open, not only for denunciation but for condemnation, and such action should not be tolerated by the Government of the United States. The chairman of the committee was well within his rights, and under the circumstances it was his duty to speak as he did. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. MAPES. Are the members of this union all employees of the Social Security Board?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. It is my understanding that they are.

Mr. MAPES. How does it happen that all the members of this group sympathizing with one side of the controversy in Spain happen to be employees of that particular Board?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not know why that is true, but it so happens that the leaders of that group have been very active. I have here a copy of the leaflet they issued called the Union Review. From a reading of this it will be found that they have indicated and given expression to opinions of partisanship for one of the groups of belligerents in Spain.

Not only is that true but had the gentleman from Michigan been a member of the committee and sat in on the consideration of this bill he would have learned that people sometimes preach neutrality but do not always practice it. We had people come down from New York to tell us how to write a neutrality bill. While one of them was speaking he handed me his literature. I read it and found that his organization was soliciting subscriptions for one of the belligerents in Spain. Upon inquiry he admitted that his organization had raised and sent to one of the war groups in Spain over a hundred thousand dollars. My objection is aimed against people telling us how to write a neutrality bill when they themselves do not practice neutrality. Neutrality cannot be attained by legislation alone, but the people must be neutral also, and at least not become active partisans in behalf of either of the belligerents in a foreign war.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman has criticized employees of the Government for taking an active part in an effort to influence legislation on this particular subject. Is that any more objectionable than the action of heads of departments in this administration actively interesting themselves on the radio and in other ways and places for the purpose of influencing the action of Congress upon the President's Supreme Court proposal?

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I think that is different in this regard, that the heads of executive branches of the Government are charged with the responsibility of directing the affairs of their departments. Furthermore, speaking over the radio by the head of a department, or even by the humblest employee, is quite different from sending a denunciatory telegram; but I would not approve of the Secretary of Labor, the Secretary of Commerce, or any other Secretary or executive head sending a telegram to the chairman of this committee telling him that his bill was pro-Fascist; that, while it pretended to be a neutrality bill, it was not, and denouncing him in the manner as was done in the telegram in question.

I do not think even a member of the Cabinet would or should have that right.

I do not think even the President of the United States would send to the chairman of this committee a telegram such as was sent to the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am complaining.

Mr. MOTT. If I may say so, it seems to me that the things said by heads of departments, who are employees of the Government also, things they have said about Members of Congress who oppose the President's Supreme Court proposal, are worse than the things done by this group of Federal employees.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I do not agree with the gentleman's conclusions for the reasons I have stated, and I do not yield further.

Mr. MOTT. I think the gentleman has already answered my question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I am informed that the senders of the telegram have now expressed their regrets to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] for having done so, and they having admitted their error, the Members and commentators who denounced the chairman for his criticism should now also admit their error in condemning him for the deserved and just rebuke which he administered.

WHAT THE BILL DOES

I shall now address myself to a consideration of the pending bill. The word "neutrality" is used as a short-term designation of this legislation, but a more appropriate and possibly a more accurate title would be, "A bill declaring the hostility of the United States against war, and to prevent our Nation from becoming involved in foreign wars."

That is the laudable purpose and the intent actuating the author of the bill, the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], and the other members of the committee who have worked with him in its preparation. It was not hastily prepared, the subject has been considered by our committee for several years and the bill as reported represents the composite judgment of the majority of that committee, after lengthy and exhaustive hearings at this and previous sessions of Congress. The subject of neutrality is a complex and complicated one, and the views of those who have given it long, serious, and conscientious consideration are entitled to have weight with the membership of the House.

It is a bill in which the American people are deeply interested, because if there is one question on which we are all united, it is a determination to keep this country out of war.

During the past two decades we have learned the futility of settling international disputes by that means. War settles nothing either while they last or when they are ended—the victors and the vanquished both lose. The Treaty of Versailles, ratified over 17 years ago and which we thought settled the World War, has been revised, and revised, and modified, and now there are ominous threats that it may be revised by another war.

Destruction of human lives, destruction of property, destruction of ideals and a blotch upon the civilization of the world is the awful toll of the World War and generations yet unborn in America and elsewhere will continue to suffer and to pay the penalties exacted by that awful holocaust.

It would seem that by now the nations of the earth would have learned that war does not pay. We have learned it in America, but in Europe and the Orient the dark clouds of war are again threatening and menacing the peace of the world.

Having learned our lesson we are determined to set our house in order so that when the storm breaks we shall be prepared to safeguard as best we can our peace and prevent our involvement if possible. If other nations elect to kill and destroy we shall refuse to be dragged into the conflict. And, furthermore, we will prevent our country or our citizens from selling or furnishing to nations engaged in war arms, ammunitions or implements of war, and this bill does just that. This provision is mandatory and applies to all warring nations. We say to the nations of the earth that we are against war and will not become parties to it or aid and abet in it by furnishing the means or implements of destruction. The bill applies not only to war between countries, but also to civil strife existing in a foreign state, where it is of such a magnitude or is being conducted under such conditions that the export of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war from the United States thereto would threaten or endanger the peace of the United States.

Second. This bill has also a mandatory provision in it denying credit to nations at war by making it unlawful for any person within the United States to purchase, sell, or exchange bonds, securities, or other obligations of the government of any belligerent state or any political subdivision thereof.

I think when the United States Government does these two things—prohibit the sale and exportation of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war, and also denies credit and loans to those nations engaged in war—that we have at least expressed in a most forceful manner our abhorrence of war and adopted a policy which will in a measure serve as a deterrent to discourage war between other nations. No war can be carried on without munitions and credit, and in the past the nations of the world have looked to the United States for both, but this they can no longer do.

Mr. Chairman, this bill does more than that. It provides for a continuance of the National Munitions Control Board with amendments, by which those exporting arms, ammunition, and implements of war at any time shall first secure a license, and so forth, which is an extension of existing law. Then, the bill provides that our ports shall not be used as a basis of supply for those engaged in a foreign war.

It provides further that the President shall have the right to regulate and prevent the entry in our ports of submarines or armed merchant ships.

It provides also that our citizens who travel during a time of war and take passage upon belligerent vessels shall do so only at their own risk, and after a proclamation has been issued it shall be unlawful for them so to do. Had this been the law when the Lusitania was sunk during the World War, no Americans would have been passengers thereon. Furthermore, American vessels are mandatorily prohibited from carrying arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any belligerent state or to any other state for transshipment to a belligerent state.

Those are seven things which this bill does, and I observed in this debate there has been very little controversy over those points.

SHIPMENT OF COMMODITIES OTHER THAN WAR MATERIALS

The one section of this bill where the battle seems to rage is section 4, which provides that under certain circumstances there shall be a limitation with reference to the shipment and exportation of other materials and commodities than strictly war materials. This is a new provision to the present temporary neutrality law and materially strengthens same. Under the present temporary neutrality law the only commodities that can be embargoed are arms, ammunition, and implements of war.

This new provision—section 4—which empowers the President, when necessary, to preserve peace or neutrality of the United States, or to protect the lives and commerce of our citizens, to place restriction on shipment of other articles and materials, in addition to arms, ammunition, and implements of war, from the United States to belligerent nations. Such restrictions may be exercised in either one or both of two ways, as the President may determine: (a) To prevent American vessels from carrying such prohibited articles or materials to belligerent states; or (b) to place further restrictions on exportation of such commodities from the United States to belligerents, by requiring a transfer of title to such commodities before same are shipped from the United States, so that no American citizen will have any title or interest in same when shipped from the United States to belligerent nations.

The chief difference between the Senate and House bills is with reference to restrictions of shipments of other materials, in addition to war supplies, the Senate bill automatically requiring transfer of title before shipment is made, while the House bill gives the President discretion to determine whether or not this limitation shall be exercised.

This is permanent legislation, and the wars of the future will differ in duration, intensity, and location.

The duration of wars in the past have been from a few months to a hundred years. Sometimes they have been fought altogether on land, sometimes principally upon sea; sometimes in one ocean, sometimes in another, and it is easily conceivable that a war might be in such location or of such a character as not to jeopardize or involve the United States or to require any restriction of the shipments of commodities other than war materials, and the President should have the power to determine when this power should be exercised.

In some wars it might be necessary for the President to both prohibit American ships from carrying any commodities to belligerent nations, and to require shipments of all commodities to belligerent nations to transfer title before shipment from the United States; while in other wars of lesser magnitude and of remote location, it might not be necessary to impose either of these requirements.

The American people are willing to forego the profits on materials shipped abroad, if it should become necessary so to do to keep us out of war, but they should not be called upon to make this sacrifice unless the conditions are so grave and the war is of such a magnitude that it is necessary to prevent war that it should be done. Under this bill we will ship no arms, ammunition, or implements of war to any warring nation, but our entire commerce abroad should not be stopped unless the war has assumed the proportions and is of such a character that shipping materials other than war materials might involve us in war.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The opponents of section 4 are divided into two groups, one who believe that the section should be entirely omitted and no limitation or restrictions whatever be made with reference to the exportation of commodities other than war materials, and the other group who think that there should be an automatic embargo or restriction upon the sale of all commodities, whether war materials or not. This bill occupies the middle ground between these extreme factions, and in my judgment is more desirable, and its enforcement would be more satisfactory and more acceptable to the American people, since it places upon the ground of necessity, as it arises, the power to restrict commerce other than war materials. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] was very critical of section 4, but his speech reminded me more of a lawyer trying to pick flaws here and there than to ascertain the intent and meaning of that section. He made the only speech on this debate which was tinged with partisanship, although he began his speech by disclaiming any partisanship in the matter. He spoke of war debts, and the failure of this administration to collect them, but omitted to state, until he was forced to do so by a question from me, that the payment on these war debts by foreign countries stopped in the Hoover administration, under Mr. Hoover's moratorium law which permitted payments to cease.

He made the statement that we discriminate in this bill against American vessels, but there is no discrimination. We cannot control ships of other nations from carrying war materials, or commodities to belligerent nations, and we do not attempt so to do. We only seek to control our own vessels, which is the only right we have outside of our own ports. He criticizes the discretion given the President in subdivision (b) of section 4, and it would appear, though it is not clear, that he thinks the restriction on commerce should be mandatory.

The Senate bill is mandatory with respect to that provision, while in our bill the matter of restricting commodities other than war materials is left to the discretion of the President. Is that not the fairest way to do it? You cannot tell what kind of war it is going to be. You do not know where it is going to be. You do not know whether the nations engaging in the war will have a navy or not. You do not know whether it will be hazardous for our people to sail the seas or for our people to sell goods.

You have to leave that discretion in the hands of the President to determine as a given situation may arise. Those wanting all provisions of the law mandatory remind me of the man who would pass a law providing that when there is a fire every fire engine in the city shall report and immediately try to put out the fire. Maybe it is just a trash fire burning out on some side street that could be handled with one engine. Wars vary in size and magnitude just as fires and other conflagrations.

We give the President this power to use as the circumstances arise and as the gravity of the situation may dictate. We say further, "Mr. President, our desire is, if possible, to be kept out of war."

We have stopped the shipment of arms, ammunition, and implements of war. We have stopped the giving of credit to other nations in time of war, and now, Mr. President, we say to you if the war becomes so intense and so dangerous it looks like we might become involved, you can do one of two things.

"You can stop our ships from carrying munitions or from carrying goods of any kind to these belligerent countries. And, furthermore, Mr. President, you can also require our people who ship goods to belligerent countries to have the title transferred before the goods are shipped to foreign countries so that if the ship is sunk and the goods are lost, no American citizen can come in and say his property rights have been damaged or destroyed."

The opponents of this measure say, "Mr. Chairman, we ought not to delegate this power to the President." They say no President should have conferred upon him such a vast power, a power that is tantamount, as one of the speakers said, to declaring war.

Mr. Chairman, the President already has power which is tantamount to declaring war. The President of the United States has the power under international law, under our Constitution, and under practices prevailing since the foundation of our Government, to send the Army and Navy at any time anywhere he desires, which action of itself could easily provoke war.

I have here a statement pointing out the various times Presidents of the United States have sent armed forces to foreign lands to protect the rights, the lives, or the property of American citizens. Here is a list of over 100 such incidents which have taken place under 20 different administrations.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to include this statement in my remarks for the historical reference that it contains.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE PROTECTION OF CITIZENS ABROAD BY THE ARMED FORCES OF THE UNITED STATES

(Milton Offutt, Ph. D., instructor in history, Princeton University)

The armed forces of the United States have been landed on foreign soil for the protection of the lives and property of American citizens living abroad on more than 100 occasions during the past 115 years. From the Aegean Islands to Manchuria and from Mexico to the Falklands, American seamen and marines have been sent ashore to prevent by force of arms the injury of their countrymen wherever these have been endangered, or to exact reparation for wrongs committed against them. Sometimes the force employed has been only a dozen seamen in a cutter, who chased a piratical schooner ashore, pursued her crew into the hills, and burned the schooner or brought her off as a prize. On other occasions, American armies of more than 3,000 men have engaged in long campaigns with the people of foreign states, operations which must have been classified as wars if it were not for the fact that the Congress of the United States never recognized them as such by a formal exercise of its unique power to declare war.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the opponents of this measure say we cannot risk the President. The founders of this Government in creating it, and we in the past, have risked the President, and history shows that the President has not abused that power. Over 100 times the armed forces of this country have been sent into foreign lands to protect by force the rights of American citizens and American property. Sometimes the force has consisted of just a few seamen; sometimes the force has been only a dozen men in a cutter, who chased a piratical schooner ashore, followed the pirates up into the hills, returned them to port, and burned the schooner.

On other occasions American armies of more than 3,000 men have engaged in long campaigns against the people of foreign states, operations which would have been classified as wars had it not been for the fact the Congress of the United States never recognized them as such by formal exercise of its power under the Constitution.

Let me name the Presidents under which such incidents occurred and such power has been exercised:

James Madison, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Andrew Jackson, Martin Van Buren, William Henry Harrison, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, Abraham Lincoln, Andrew Johnson, Ulysses S. Grant, Chester A. Arthur, Grover Cleveland, Benjamin Harrison, William McKinley, Theodore Roosevelt, William H. Taft, Woodrow Wilson, and Calvin Coolidge.

The book relating those incidents was written about the close of the administration of President Coolidge.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, those who claim we are preaching or proposing a new and untried doctrine, that we are delegating to the President powers he has not had before and giving him the right to exercise this discretion, are either ignorant of history or are trying to mislead the people into believing the President has not yet had powers tantamount to this, which might involve us in war.

Presidents of the United States have been as strongly for peace as has the Congress of the United States. Throughout the history of this country the Presidents, charged with responsibility as they are, have been just as eager to preserve peace in this country as has the Congress of the United States. I do not have time to discuss this further, but a comparison of the pacific tendencies of the Congress and the Presidents will not unfavorably reflect on the Presidents of the United States.

The Supreme Court of the United States in United States against Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation, delivered on December 21, 1936, wherein a similar act of Congress, delegating to the President authority to prohibit the sale of arms and ammunitions of war to countries engaged in war in South America, was involved, reviewed at length the power of Congress to delegate this authority to the President and held that the President had this inherent authority without delegation by Congress and that the President's power with reference to external affairs of the United States was far more comprehensive and sweeping than his powers within the United States. The opinion cited a statement made by Chief Justice Marshall on March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, wherein he stated:

> The President is the sole organ of the Nation in its external relations and its sole representative with foreign nations.

Quoting further from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case cited is this language:

> It is quite apparent that if, in the maintenance of our international relations, embarrassment—perhaps serious embarrassment—is to be avoided and success for our aims achieved, congressional legislation which is to be made effective through negotiation and inquiry within the international field must often accord to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved. Moreover, he, not Congress, has the better opportunity of knowing the conditions which prevail in foreign countries, and especially is this true in time of war. He has his confidential sources of information. He has his agents in the form of diplomatic, consular, and other officials.

DISCRETIONARY OR MANDATORY

There has been considerable confusion and misunderstanding created throughout the country by the use of the terms "discretionary" and "mandatory", as applied to neutrality legislation. Some who use the word "mandatory" as contra-distinguished to "discretionary" explain that they mean that the President should apply proclamations against all countries alike, and to these our bill is acceptable, for it provides in subsection (e), in section 4, that any proclamation issued by the President shall apply equally to all belligerents. There is no discretion left to the President to treat the belligerents differently. All under this bill must be treated alike.

The terms "flexible" and "inflexible", I think, are more appropriate than "mandatory" and "discretionary", as applied to section 4 of the bill, and I have already pointed out why I think that that section which relates to export of commodities other than war materials should be left to the discretion of the President, and should not be inflexible.

It is believed that President Roosevelt is in sympathy with the flexible rather than the inflexible provisions of this bill, and as proof of this I cite a paragraph from a statement which he made on August 31, 1935, when he signed the first temporary neutrality bill passed by this Congress:

> It is the policy of this Government to avoid being drawn into wars between other nations, but it is a fact that no Congress and no Executive can foresee all possible future situations. History is filled with unforeseeable situations that call for some flexibility of action. It is conceivable that situations may arise in which the wholly inflexible provisions of section 1 of this act might have exactly the opposite effect from that which was intended. In other words, the inflexible provisions might drag us into war instead of keeping us out.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is not a perfect measure. No bill upon this controversial subject could be written that would be pleasing to everyone. We do not claim it is an insurance policy that will keep us out of war. No law can keep people out of war, because war is caused by a state of mind. When the mind becomes inflamed and passions are aroused, men fight; but here is what this bill will do, and this is what it is designed to do. It is to prevent irritating circumstances that might arise when war is in progress in other countries with reference to the claims of our people in the shipment of goods or in being passengers upon vessels or permitting our county to become involved by reason of the various circumstances which we seek to prevent; and we say it will minimize, it will reduce, it will lessen the hazards of war, and I think if we can pass a law that will even in the slightest degree tend to keep this country of ours from becoming involved in a war between foreign countries it is our duty to do so. I think the American people want such a law and I believe this Congress is going to pass it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. THOMAS of Texas). The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, before making a statement on the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 51) I pause to pay a deserving tribute to our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS]. Every member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and particularly the new members, are indebted to him for his unlimited patience, his unfailing courtesy, and his most generous consideration.

To our distinguished colleague, the ranking member of the minority, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], we are indebted for his independence of thought, his unquestioned courage, his tireless energy, and his intellectual honesty in making his contribution to the subject of neutrality, which we are discussing today.

The hope of the civilized world is peace. War is abhorrent to all people. Nations are struggling beneath the burden of taxes caused by wars, and humanity mourns from war's merciless toll. To prevent war has been the problem of centuries. Our own country has been and is now in the forefront to bring about that most desirable objective, peace.

The Washington Disarmament Conference of 1922, held in this city, brought forth the famous 5-5-3 agreement with Great Britain and Japan. It led the way for the reduction of armament over a period of years and was a step toward peace. It saved this Nation millions of dollars annually until a short time ago, when it was abandoned or expired.

Every nation in the world ought to be invited by this Government to join in a conference for the purpose of bringing about, if possible, world disarmament. A determined effort should be made again by the Government of the United States to continue the policy and the principle of disarmament until the great nations of the earth have done away with vast navies and great war machines and each maintain only a national police force. It would be the one great step toward world peace. Such a program should challenge the attention and the interest of the nations of the world. It ought to and it would halt the mad race of world powers today to increase their armament and provide enormous machinery for war. If that were done, it seems to me that neutrality, such as we seek to obtain under the joint resolution before the House today, would be easy to maintain.

Our present neutrality law empowers the President to lay embargoes on arms, ammunitions, and implements of war. That law will expire May 1 of this year. The bill before us goes further, in that it authorizes the President, under section 4, to restrict or embargo the shipment of other materials or commodities in American ships to belligerents if in his judgment it is necessary to promote security and preserve the peace and the neutrality of the United States and the lives and commerce of our nationals. That is the principal difference between the law as it now exists and the proposed measure before us. It is the only section in the bill, in my judgment, over which there can be any controversy.

The sole object in the minds of every Member of this body is to preserve peace and keep this country out of war. Neutrality is a complicated and difficult problem. It is a supersensitive subject. To that end the committee has devoted much time and held many hearings to bring before the House the bill under consideration.

There may be and there is some difference of opinion as to the wisdom of section 4 of the bill. The entire measure and the subject of neutrality is nonpartisan and nonpolitical. There can be no politics in the question of peace or war. It is the common cause of all. It affects all alike. It is the opinion of some that section 4 of the bill, restricting the exportation of commodities other than arms, munitions, and implements of war and making it unlawful for American ships to carry such articles to belligerent countries, will work to the detriment of our foreign commerce and, also, our domestic commerce. That it will withdraw the American flag from the seas, that it will relegate American ships to useless inaction in some American port; that it will be a surrender of the right of freedom of the seas; and that it will compel us to stand idly by and watch other nations, and particularly those which control the seas, such as Great Britain and Japan, acquire trade and commerce enjoyed by the people of the United States. It is more than a tradition with us that we have insisted upon the freedom of the seas. It has been the policy of the Nation for a century and a quarter. We fought and won a war to maintain that right.

Because of the complexity and the many questions which this subject raises, it requires the most serious consideration of the Congress whether or not we should make it unlawful for American ships to carry commodities to belligerent nations in time of war or whether or not we should reserve the right and amend section 4 of the bill to permit this Nation to carry on its reasonable and normal commerce and trade in American ships with belligerents, such trade and commerce to be based upon the usual and ordinary trade enjoyed with such countries in time of peace. A policy of trade in time of peace, whether under treaty or reciprocal-trade agreement, should not be materially changed, if changed at all, in time of war with countries not at war with the United States.

To delegate to the President the power to determine whether it is necessary to the security, preserve the peace, and protect the lives and commerce of our nationals by restricting the exportation of commodities and materials other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war in American ships, may constitute an invitation abroad to provoke a situation which would compel the President to do that very thing, viz, issue or lay an embargo on commodities, for the express purpose of securing a part of the foreign and domestic commerce of this country.

That we have the right and we insist upon the right to sell commodities to belligerents is not the question before us. The only question involved in this bill is, Shall we reserve the right to deliver such commodities to nations at war in American ships?

In my judgment, this is the only question involved in section 4 of the bill.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Assuming that we amend the bill and permit the United States to carry on its usual trade with belligerent countries, and in so doing we permit our ships to carry commodities to these belligerent countries, and one of our ships is sunk by one of the belligerents in carrying goods over there, what would be the attitude of the gentleman and what does he think the attitude of this country would be with respect to probably going to war with such belligerent country?

Mr. DONDERO. Undoubtedly that would cause strained relations; but suppose Japan and Great Britain were at war, and the scene of conflict was laid in the Atlantic Ocean and not in the Pacific, does the gentleman think we ought to stop all commerce with Japan from our western coast?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I do not think we ought to stop all commerce, but I do think we ought to stop carrying goods to belligerent countries if by so doing we can maintain the peace of this country. I think it far better to have the people who are engaged in foreign commerce here forego a little profit and far better to see this country forego a little profit on its merchant marine than to carry goods to such countries and become engaged ourselves in war.

Mr. DONDERO. In answer to the gentleman from Mississippi, my position, insofar as our commerce is concerned, is that it is a very serious and a debatable question whether or not we should surrender the normal and reasonable trade between this Nation and belligerents in time of war if those nations know in advance what our policy is. There is much to be said on both sides of that question.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Does not the gentleman think we could carry on some trade with such countries by permitting them to come to this country and get our commodities and then transfer the title to them so that our people would not become involved in claims against such belligerent countries?

Mr. DONDERO. If we do that and prevent American ships from delivering those commodities, which is the only question I raise, then other nations will come here and get such commodities and deliver them to the belligerent nations or the belligerent nations will seek out other countries of the world with which to do business and leave America holding the bag, as we say in common parlance. This is the difficulty with such a situation.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is it not also true that if the foreign ships come to this country and load with our commodities, the other belligerent nations will not allow this, and this will bring war to our shores or very close to our own door?

Mr. DONDERO. The gentlewoman means in sinking the ships of other nations, which come here for our commodities?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; there will be many submarines and other battleships near our own shores.

Mr. DONDERO. The distinguished lady from Massachusetts is undoubtedly correct. As I have said, it is a supersensitive subject with which we are dealing.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And is it not also true that in the great World War, in the case of almost all the goods shipped, the title had been taken by some foreigner before the goods were shipped? I am told on good authority that the American merchants were not willing to take the chance and were not willing to sell their goods until the title was taken over by a foreign firm.

Mr. DONDERO. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts is correct, and that is the idea or the principle involved in this bill, that all title and interest in the commodities shall terminate before they leave American shores.

I can readily see that the reservation of that right to deliver such commodities to the extent, at least, of the normal trade and commerce enjoyed with such belligerent country, is debatable and raises many questions. It is a question which should have the most serious consideration of the Congress.

I now come to section 5 of the bill, and refer to that portion of the section which prohibits our people from soliciting or receiving contributions for the benefit of any belligerent state or state wherein civil strife exists. Testimony before our committee, and it was referred to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], revealed the fact that some of our people in this country were active in raising funds and did collect more than $100,000 for the use and benefit of one of the factions now engaged in civil strife in Spain. It is hardly necessary to point out that such activities and procedure on the part of some of our nationals is not neutral and offends any friendly government. I believe that section 5 is a sound provision and that it will aid this country to remain neutral.

Section 9 of the bill, prohibiting American citizens traveling on ships of belligerent nations, should receive the unanimous approval of the House. It is a forward step toward removing complications and differences and an aid in maintaining our neutrality.

The bill may be properly called one to maintain the peace of the United States as well as one to maintain its neutrality toward belligerent nations. We desire peace. We abhor war. We do not covet the territory of any other nation. We mean to mind our own business. I shall vote for the bill as it is written or as it may be amended, believing that it is better than the Pittman bill in many ways, which have already been pointed out. Amendments will be offered on the floor during the debate. Let each amendment be weighed carefully in a strict nonpartisan manner regardless from which side of the aisle they may be presented. The Nation is entitled to the individual and collective thought of every one of us on this most important subject. It may be the most important bill to come before us during this session of Congress for it is of the greatest concern to every citizen.

We took a step toward neutrality 2 years ago. Let us walk slowly in this matter but not backward.

Europe is arming in heat and haste, obviously in preparation for war to come. What we do here in reference to this legislation may be the means of keeping the United States out of another conflict.

Those who now live will not live long enough to see the time when the burden of debt piled on the backs of the people of the United States as a result of the World War will be fully raised and paid. The world is nearly bankrupt because of wars and rumors of war. We are spending more than a billion dollars annually on our Army and Navy, and the end is not yet. Other nations are spending more billions preparing for war. I say that such a condition is a rebuke and a reproach to the civilized world, and the teaching of the white-souled Man of Galilee becomes a hollow mockery.

Let us apply to this bill our most serious judgment in the hope that we will move toward that happy day when races and nations will know war no more. [Applause.]

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. If I understand the gentleman from Michigan—and I have a very high regard for his opinion on any subject—this bill is not what he would like to have it, and necessarily could not meet all of the demands and opinions of the various members of the committee, much less Congress; yet he feels that it is a step in the right direction and that it is better than no bill, and, even with the misgivings he has about it, he will support it.

Mr. DONDERO. I shall support it because I believe it far better than the Senate bill, and perhaps it is the best bill that we can obtain under the conditions we are facing today.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

THE NEUTRALITY ACT OF 1937

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, two things have been impressive to me during my membership in this Congress. The first has been the courtesy and gentle treatment the presiding officer has extended to new Members, and personally I appreciate it. The second has been the obvious sincerity of the Members of the House who have addressed us on various questions, and certainly on no question more than the one we are now considering.

Every Member of this House, I feel, conscientiously and earnestly wants to do that thing which will keep America out of war, and the only question in our minds is: What is the best way to accomplish this object?

We have been told that this proposed Neutrality Act of 1937 is not an act for a day or a year, but it is to declare a new policy for the United States from now on. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], who opened the debate this afternoon, stressed that fact. So, in discussing a particular phase of it, I am not considering personalities of the present day, but am looking at the application of this measure, and particularly of section 4, throughout the course of years.

Section 3 provides for a "mandatory" embargo on arms and munitions of war. Section 4 provides for a "discretionary" embargo on other articles and commodities. Then, skipping sections about which there is no particular question, I would also note section 11, which specifically exempts American republics from the applications of the act.

My remarks will be directed to section 4, which would establish a discretionary embargo for supplies other than munitions. My doubts as to section 4 rest on four grounds:

In the first place, "discretion" in drawing the lines on various commodities destroys neutrality by the very name itself.

Second. Application of an embargo on commodities in a discretionary way will evoke reprisals by the nations hurt and thereby involve us in war whether we will or not.

Third. America cannot entirely escape the obligations of humanity in the family of nations, and any assertion of America's responsibility in such matters should be a deliberative act of the Congress, and not a matter of chance growing out of a technical violation of the rules prescribed and modified from time to time by any one man.

Fourth. Presidential discretion is not the road away from war. The road away from war calls for placing the decision on questions of peace and war nearer to the people, not farther away from them as section 4 will do.

COMPARE SECTIONS 3 AND 4

Time does not permit me to go into great detail, but if I can state these points clearly, your own minds will provide better illustrations and more effective logic to carry them to sound conclusions. It would be helpful if everyone would read the parallel parts of sections 3 and 4 to note the difference proposed between the mandatory embargo on arms and the discretionary embargo on commodities. From section 3 I read:

It shall thereafter be unlawful to export * * * arms, ammunition, or implements of war.

Again:

The President, by proclamation, shall definitely enumerate the arms.

Those are the positive provisions in section 3. Now read section 4, on commodities. The provision is:

It shall thereafter be unlawful except under such limitations and exceptions as the President may prescribe.

And in section 4 we have an extra paragraph, paragraph (d), to emphasize the discretionary feature, which says:

The President may from time to time change, modify, or revoke in whole or in part any proclamations issued by him under this section.

This has resulted in two entirely different arguments being presented to this body in support of this bill. Some speakers have said, "This is true neutrality, because it serves notice in advance that we may embargo commodities. The giving of a notice in advance constitutes equal treatment." These men recognize, of course, that if the conditions or rules of war be changed while war is going on, that of itself is a violation of neutrality. But other speakers have said, "The virtue of this bill is that it is flexible; that it will change from time to time; that the President can modify it from time to time."

The fact is that if either argument be the virtue of this bill, then the other cannot be. The truth is that we only serve notice that we "may" embargo commodities. Whether we do or whether we do not, these rules and these regulations can be "changed" from time to time, "modified or revoked" by a Presidential order. In that sense we do not have a true neutrality bill in section 4. Questions will arise as to what are proper commodities for an embargo. In one war or at one period during a war oil may be the thing. Later, cotton may be the thing. And the fortunes of war will shift with every shift of Presidential favor.

This can be resolved to simple terms. Suppose two Members of this House were to violate ordinary procedure and engage in a fight on this floor. And suppose one of you were to say, "We will keep this man's family from getting any supplies"; how long before that man would figure you were his opponent, too?

THE ALLY OF THE AGGRESSOR

This section 4 makes America the ally of any strong power that threatens or attempts to starve an innocent people. Section 4 means, if it means anything, if we are going to use it, that America becomes the ally of that nation that has the power to enforce whatever measures of war they want to enforce.

This will result not merely in pressure from abroad; it will result in pressure at home. It will mean that the injured industry, the injured commerce at home, will seek modifications, will seek changes, from time to time.

This bill specifically provides for changes from time to time. That is not the essence of neutrality. The essence of neutrality is even-handed treatment to all parties. A change in policy after war is begun is either an act of friendship or an act of hostility, according to whether it hurts or helps a given nation. "Discretionary" changes "from time to time" destroy neutrality. Neutrality is neutrality only when it is fixed, certain, and mandatory.

The second thing that makes section 4 objectionable is that discretionary changes will invoke reprisals by the nations hurt. We have experience to guide us on this particular count.

A LESSON IN HISTORY

During the Jefferson administration we tried discretionary embargoes upon commodities. Jefferson abhorred war. Yet every step that he took to meet the paper blockades in the early Napoleonic wars brought retaliatory acts by the nations hurt.

England's Fox blockade sought to close certain French ports to neutral shippers. Jefferson tried to make England repent by a nonimportation act. Napoleon issued his Berlin decree declaring a paper blockade of British ports. England responded with her orders in council, closing coastwise trade to neutral ships and forbidding neutral trade from Trieste to Copenhagen unless the vessels cleared in British ports. Jefferson then asked Congress for an embargo act prohibiting the departure of merchant vessels except foreign ships in ballast. That is what section 4 now proposes to try again.

Look at what happened before. I quote from John Spencer Bassett's History of the United States (pp. 310–311):

> The President (Jefferson) was given "discretionary power" to modify the operation of the law in specific cases, but its duration was made indefinite. Peaceful coercion was an untried experiment of far-reaching effects, yet it passed the two Houses in 4 days and was a law before the people understood its significance. Congress accepted it on the authority of Jefferson. The first attempts at enforcement showed that peaceful coercion was impracticable. Shipowners would not give up a trade which became more profitable as it became more dangerous. * * * Those whose ships remained at home complained loudly. * * * Supplementary acts were passed to make it effective. * * * At first the farmers did not feel the embargo. * * * By the end of the summer it came home to them in lower prices. * * * In the autumn two more enforcing acts were passed. Even a rowboat was now subject to the law, and collectors of the ports were given despotic powers over every ship that sailed. * * * He (Jefferson) was at last brought to sign a bill to supersede the embargo by the Nonintercourse Act of 1809. It decreed nonintercourse with England and France, leaving the President to suspend it for whichever of the two nations should first abandon her restrictions. Jefferson signed the bill in much bitterness of spirit and a few days later retired from office.

We did not get out of the mess until we had the War of 1812.

Jernegan, Carlson, and Ross, in the recently published Growth of the American People, are hardly less encouraging in their estimate of our venture into the field of discretionary diplomacy. They recall that—

> Napoleon confiscated American ships that came into the ports of France and jokingly said that he was helping Jefferson enforce his embargo (p. 232).

The lesson of history, over and over again, is that necessity knows no law. No matter how much fair notice is given, embargoes will hurt somebody, and that somebody will retaliate. We may ignore, for a time, the squeals at home but we cannot escape reprisals abroad against any discretionary, discriminating policy, "changing, modifying, or being revoked from time to time."

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Briefly; yes.

Mr. THOM. Is it not a fact that the Jefferson embargo laws seemingly failed because of sentiment in this country against obeying them?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Partly; but remember that sentiment was produced by reprisals that were adopted by England and France.

WE ARE A FAMILY OF NATIONS

The next point I want to mention is that, no matter how much we desire to be neutral, America cannot entirely escape her obligations as a member of the family of nations. When the time comes that America should have a conviction upon such matters, possibly involving war, it should be the result of deliberate—and I mean deliberate—judgment of the whole Congress and not the result of any technical infringement of rules "proclaimed, changed, modified, or revoked in whole or in part from time to time" by any one man.

Here, also, I would mention section 11 of the bill, which makes an exception in the application of the entire law to the Republics of America. That certainly is well-intentioned, but I ask you, Have we any interest in the affairs of the Latin-American Republics and the sanctities of the principles for which they might become engaged in war that we would not have for Canada? And yet by this act itself we except the American Republics but not Canada.

How long will that stand up under any President's good-neighbor policy, if Canada gets into war? Canada will ask, "Do we not mean as much to you as the Latin-American countries?" And when the President yields once for Canada, modifying commodity embargoes by releasing—for all nations, of course—the particular commodity that Canada wants, your whole house of neutrality falls.

You remember how we progressed in 1917. At first we were only going to give moral support. Then we were going to send 25,000 men. Then—you know the full story without my repeating it.

I forego a discussion of the "reasons" for exempting the American republics from the provisions of this entire act except to say this: I have the kindest feeling for our sister republics. But I wonder if our excepting them from this bill is entirely because of a fraternal feeling or because the munition makers cannot give them up. They are "excepted" not merely for the commodity section; they are excepted for all provisions of the act, free from embargoes on arms and munitions in civil strife as well as foreign war.

If exceptions are ever made in the protection of American principles they should only be made with the full realization that any change may carry with it a decision for peace or war.

And my contention is that when these decisions are made the people should not be the victims of a chance policy or a technical violation of a Presidential rule.

Let me go further and say that I believe that the road away from war calls for placing the decisions on engaging in foreign wars nearer to the people instead of further away from them.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON], in opening the debate this afternoon, explained how far Presidents can go and have gone in the direction of war or foreign entanglements. This may be true, but whatever the situation in the past, that does not justify us in telling the President he can go still further now. That is not the road away from war.

LET THE PEOPLE CHOOSE

For I agree entirely in principle with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], who believes that the people who fight the wars and furnish the boys, furnish the mothers, and furnish the money and pay the taxes and bind up the broken hearts and suffer the inexpressible pains of war—I believe that those people should be given the right to say whether or not the issues as they know them are ever worth the cost of sending their sons to foreign battlefields again.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and I may differ slightly in the particular form of the constitutional amendments which we have offered to accomplish this purpose, but we are one in aim and one in purpose. This House today, and every day that the subject of peace or war is mentioned, echoes to the cry that the people want peace, that "the people" want none of war. Then, in God's name—ah, in the name of those living and dead who have put their all on the altar of freedom from war—why not put it in the hands of the people to say whether the issues are worth war?

We beat our breasts here and cry to heaven about the mind and heart of America being for peace. Then why not implement this will of the people for peace by giving to them the discretion in actual declarations of foreign wars? Why not give these hearts a voice?

Ladies and gentlemen, the measure before us is headed the other way. It does not restore the power of choice on war to the people; it removes it farther from them. They become, more than ever in the history of America, the pawns of Presidential policy.

Now, then, if the Congress is going to throw up this power to declare war—this responsibility to determine our attitude and position as between nations at war—there is only one direction in which it should be thrown. That is to put it back in the hands of those who gave it to us—into the hands of the people themselves.

We beat our breasts in this Chamber and tell the world how devoted we are to the subject of peace. But if, in the name of neutrality, we pass an act that contains a section that involves the people in war again, the people will not hold us guiltless. Many Members have said to me in the last few days, "I am not sure what this bill means, but I guess we shall have to vote for it because it is on neutrality."

Ladies and gentlemen, not what we name this bill but what it does determines its character. I plead with you that we do not kid the people again. Let us give them a straight Neutrality Act, or let us clean it up so that it does not have in it a discretionary section which will involve this country in war. This is not true neutrality. If the Congress is going to throw aside its duty and turn over to another this power of passing upon specific cases, do not give it to one man, give it to the people themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. In view of the fact that the gentleman is not willing to give the President any discretion with reference to the embargoing of commodities, what is the gentleman's attitude? Should the Congress pass a law making an absolute embargo?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think it should be either a mandatory embargo of commodities or it should be dealt with in separate bills passed on by Congress from time to time.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Does not that suggestion destroy the thought the gentleman had a moment ago that we would cause retaliatory measures on the part of other countries?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. My thought is that the power would at least be in the hands of Congress to make our adjustments and choose our alliances rather than letting the President make them for us.

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS].

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, the McReynolds bill, for which I now desire to speak in my feeble way, has been vigorously defended upon the floor of this House and just about as vigorously condemned.

There seem to be several lines of thought as to what the United States should do in order to prevent the possibility of our being embroiled in future wars that do not concern our national integrity. Sometimes it puts a Member of Congress in the same position that our distinguished, beloved, and impartial colleague found himself the other day, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON], when he said he felt very much like a jackass starving to death between two bales of hay.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is a Member of this Congress who is not for peace. I do not think one could go out into the byways and hedges of this Nation and find any citizen who is in favor of war with any nation on the face of the earth.

I do not believe the officials of any foreign nation on earth believe in their hearts that the United States of America is a menace to peace. So the stage is properly set here in this country for the blazing of peace paths in new directions formerly untrod by man. The McReynolds bill will properly move our Nation forward on a new path, with peace for our people its objective. Some of the Members here seem to believe in neither the McReynolds bill nor the Pittman bill. I notice that some Members believe we will never have peace in the United States or among the nations of the world unless there comes into the minds and souls of the peoples of the world a spirit of cooperation, when men can sit down together and decide all misunderstandings peacefully by the give-and-take method. That is the doctrine taught by the great Prince of Peace and it is a proper doctrine. I think the people of America believe in that doctrine, but also may I say the people of America are convinced that that doctrine has failed to work, not because of lack of merit in it but because of lack of sincere effort to put it into practice by those who now control the destinies of foreign nations.

So now we must heed the Scriptural admonition:

> But if any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own house, he has denied the faith, and is worse than an infidel.

Mr. Chairman, there are two major objectives in the McReynolds bill. The first and paramount objective is to insure peace for the people of the United States and, to so provide, the proponents of the McReynolds bill believe it is necessary, that in the event of foreign wars which may possibly involve us, it may be necessary to circumscribe the rights of our own citizens to prevent our being drawn into the conflict, and I ask my colleagues to seriously weigh the merits of this objective. There is the secondary objective and that is, if we can provide peace for the people of the United States by enactment of this law, we also aim to deal justly at the same time with all of the other nations of the earth. That is a cardinal point in this bill.

Many of the gentlemen on the committee and many of my colleagues of the House have discussed very ably, fully, and exhaustively the various provisions of this bill. In my effort to possibly throw a little light on the subject for some of my colleagues who have not heard these able discussions, I am going to try to direct my remarks to the one or two main controversial points of the bill.

To go back a little, it seems there is one school of thought that believes in mandatory embargoes. There is another school of thought that believes in discretionary embargoes. There is a third school of thought that believes in building the greatest army and the greatest navy in the world to protect that misnomer called the "freedom of the seas." There is also a fourth school of thought that believes we should do nothing but sit down and twiddle our thumbs.

I want to commend the Members of this House on both sides for the impartial consideration they have given this bill. With possibly one exception, there has been no exhibition of party partisanship, and I am sure the Members of the House are glad of that. I have been a Member of the Congress for about 4 years and week after week and month after month I have heard my distinguished and learned friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] get up on the floor of the House and proclaim in a very loud voice that this is not a political or sectional or partisan matter. Invariably I have found that this opening refrain was almost invariably only a prelude to a partisan attack by the gentleman himself. He is one of the most partisan gentlemen in the House. What did the gentleman say when he got up here the other day? First, he said:

> I want to commend the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee for his able and hard work.

Of course, we all commend the able chairman, for he deserves this praise. I felt like applauding when the gentleman from New York made that statement. The gentleman said further:

> I want to commend the majority for the fair and open rule they have brought here, under which the bill will be considered.

I said to myself, "The gentleman from New York is going to break his record now. He has started out on a new path." Then he went on a little further and besought that no Member of the House bring partisan discussion into the debate on this bill. Mr. Chairman, I could not believe my ears. But as the gentleman proceeded with his argument, based upon the minority report he had filed, and about which, by the way, very little has been said by other opponents of the bill, as my friend spoke on one section after another for an hour or more, I soon was disappointed to find that his attitude was, as of old, reeking with partisanship, and that the minority report which he had filed was shot full of the holes of inconsistency.

The gentleman from New York is my friend. And I think he is one of the most well-informed men from some angles in this Congress. I like him.

The gentleman started out by quoting Mr. BORAH, the able Senator from Idaho, and Senator JOHNSON of California, stating in substance that these distinguished gentlemen contend that the provisions of the McReynolds bill, if enacted into law, will, in effect, render our Navy useless and place our merchant marine in a state of what the gentleman from New York calls "innocuous desuetude." We go a little further and we find that, in his attack on the provision to grant discretionary power to the President in the McReynolds bill, he does not quote Senator BORAH on that subject. Senator BORAH, one of the great constitutional lawyers in the Nation, whether you agree with him or not, said he is in favor of preserving and defending all of our rights to freedom on the high seas; but the distinguished Senator said further that if we do abandon the doctrine of freedom of the seas, discretion in embargo matters should be placed in the President of the United States, where it was placed by the fathers who wrote the Constitution of the United States. The gentleman from New York knows of the Curtiss-Wright case in which the Supreme Court, with only one dissenting voice, decided that the President of the United States should have this discretionary power. The gentleman knows that, since this Republic first came into existence, the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy has had the power to do almost anything with the Army and Navy, when dealing in foreign affairs, except declare war and provide appropriations to carry on war. That is the right and duty of the Congress.

My friend has become confirmed in his habit of rising here to criticize the Democratic Party because the President, the Secretary of State, or the head of some other department has recommended that we pass this, that, or the other kind of legislation. He has attempted to hold the majority here up to the people of this country as a laughingstock because of the fact that we Democrats at times are willing to take the advice and benefit by the wisdom of our chief, one of the greatest Presidents in the history of our country.

Now the gentleman has proved himself consistent in his inconsistency by inquiring of the majority, "What is the recommendation of your leader relative to this bill? Has he sent no word up here from his sanctum down yonder?" "Is the voice of our great Secretary of State"—whose trade treaties are doing more for the peace of the world than anything else which is being done at this time—"silent on this question?"

Formerly the gentleman was railing at the Congress of the United States because it was passing bills recommended by the President of the United States. Today he is asking you to defeat this bill because the President of the United States and the Secretary of State are silent on the subject.

My friend, the gentleman from New York, is a very learned scholar. He talks much about freedom of the seas. I fear to engage him on that subject, but I cannot resist the temptation to interject a few more feeble words in an attempt to show a little further his inconsistency. However, in an attempt to keep my argument a little in line, I must direct your attention now to what is doubtless the most controversial section of the bill—paragraphs (a) and (b) of section 4, which give the President discretionary authority to embargo certain supplies of war when he thinks the shipment of such supplies will endanger the peace of the United States.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I am sorry; I cannot yield to the gentleman from Mississippi. I have but 15 minutes, and only wish I could yield to the gentleman, whom I consider to be one of the ablest and most conscientious Members of the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, the great bone of contention here is the freedom of the seas. The gentleman from New York—and I refer to him so often only because he is leading the fight against this bill—brought in a minority report; but when he addressed the House the other day, almost confessed that he, himself, believed in very little of his report. Certainly, as yet he has not championed this minority report.

We have been living as a nation for a century and a half, and during all of that time we have claimed our right to sail the seven seas, in war or in peace, but we have actually enjoyed this right only when other great nations were at peace.

But the gentleman contends that this bill is a supine surrender to Great Britain and Japan if, in the President's discretion, warring nations are required to come over here and, under the cash-and-carry plan, carry supplies home in their own ships, we are then surrendering the precious doctrine of freedom of the seas, he says, to Great Britain, whose Navy controls the Atlantic, and Japan, whose Navy controls the Pacific.

Well, Great Britain has controlled the Atlantic and Japan has controlled the Pacific for a long time because our Navy must necessarily be divided. England had the control of the Atlantic before we became involved in the World War and while we were asserting the great international right of freedom of the seas. How far did we get against Britain's embargo? We sent many notes of protest but they were unheeded. A few days ago the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LUCKEY] put in the RECORD an embargo list of Great Britain. I had also secured this list from the Secretary of State and had intended to put it in the RECORD myself. To be fair I must say that Great Britain was not the only nation sending out these all-inclusive embargo lists. Germany, France, Italy, and other nations involved in the World War did the same thing. The rub is that only the great nations with powerful fleets can enforce an embargo. So I ask you gentlemen, where is your freedom of the seas? The answer is—freedom of the seas is with the powerful fleet.

Great Britain's World War embargo list included everything in the world. It included foods, every type of food, I may say to you men from out West who have your wheat and your corn; to you men from down South, it included every possible type of cotton material, raw cotton and everything else; to you great hog raisers, I say it included every part of a pig that could be put down in black and white. Take a pig, now, just a simple little old pig. This embargo list of Great Britain said, "You cannot carry any meat to Germany or to the Central Powers; you cannot carry any animals over there." They thought maybe that would not include a pig, so after a while they put the "pig" in. They thought maybe that would not include every part of a pig, so they added to the list, "All hair of every kind, all bone material, all sausage, all sausage skins, and even bladders." So you see we had to either keep our pork at home or sell it to Great Britain.

So, my colleagues, I call to your attention as a final inconsistency in the argument against this bill by the gentleman from New York, another assertion in his speech of last Friday:

> I, for one, am willing to make very large concessions and surrender a large part of our freedom of the seas, because if you analyze the principle of the freedom of the seas, you will find it has involved us in every single foreign war in the last 150 years with one exception, the Crimean War. It involved us in a limited war with France in 1798 to 1800. It involved us in the War of 1812 and in the World War, because we insisted on our neutral right to sell arms and everything else to belligerent nations. That is what the freedom of the seas is. We propose to change that.

These are the gentleman's words, not mine. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I was very sorry that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS] was not willing to yield for a question. I wished to ask him if he did not feel that, at the bottom of his heart, the Secretary of State, a very distinguished gentleman and a former Member of the House of Representatives, was not really very sorry that this bill may pass the House of Representatives, because, surely, under the provisions of this bill, the Secretary's reciprocal-trade agreements, if not abolished entirely with those countries that might be belligerent countries, certainly would be very much restricted. I know he has stated repeatedly—I do not recall his exact words to quote them, but I shall find out what they are and put them in the RECORD, if the House would like to have them—that the greatest aid to peace or the greatest protection to countries is to have their trade go on as much as possible.

Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the gentleman from South Carolina in that the discussion of this bill has been a partisan one in any way. I commend the very able and distinguished chairman of the committee and the Members of the majority side, and also the great World War soldier and tremendously capable leader of the minority, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], and the other minority Members, for the lack of partisanship shown in the discussion of the bill in the committee and on the floor; and I am thankful we are having 10 hours of debate upon what I believe to be one of the most important and far-reaching measures that has ever come before the House. This discussion is with respect to a permanent neutrality bill. This is not a bill for 1 year of proposed neutrality or 6 months of proposed neutrality but a permanent plan. I know the people all over the country want their Representatives to discuss fully this measure, because it is they, your constituents and my constituents, who pay the bills when we go to war. They pay the bills in dollars and cents; they pay the bills in heartache, and those who fight give their lives for us, and those who bear the terrible marks and scars of war give even more.

There are many things, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, worse than death; there is dishonor, and I am going to remind the House just for one moment we have not heard much of this in this debate—that we are the greatest nation in all the world, the most honorable nation in all the world, and the most generous. We covet the possessions of no other nation, but at times it may be, Mr. Chairman, we must defend our honor.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said here that the minority report has not been referred to. I am going to quote two paragraphs from that report. Of course, Mr. Chairman, to my mind the title of the bill as a neutrality bill is a misnomer. I know the Members are perfectly sincere in feeling that it is a neutrality bill, but if it is carried out and there is a war, it will be an unneutral measure. If we give the President the discretion to change the rules of the game, to change the regulations, after the war has started, surely this is not neutral; it is discriminatory, and will not be fair either to one side or to the other. It is the most ostrichlike bill that can be imagined, and I quote, Mr. Chairman, from the minority report:

> We, the undersigned, are opposed to the Congress delegating its constitutional power to declare war to the President, whether he is a Democrat or a Republican. In order to clarify the statement that the discretionary powers granted the President in this bill are apt to carry with them the war-making powers of Congress the following quotation is cited from a letter written by John Bassett Moore, one of the best-known authorities on international law, former judge of the World Court and counselor in the Department of State under Woodrow Wilson, which was submitted to the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain, and I am not alone in this, that John Bassett Moore is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, authority on international law, and I quote from Mr. Moore:

> You are correct in saying that, so far as concerns the proposed surrender by Congress of its exclusive constitutional power to declare war, they for the most part in no respect differ from the measures introduced a year ago to empower the President, in his uncontrolled discretion, to engage in war and carry it on without the prior declaration which our fundamental law requires. To seek to save appearances by using in the title phrases such as "to maintain the neutrality of the United States", or to "promote peace", is at best a form of self-deception of the most delusive and unsubstantial kind. No one who wished unlimited power to make war could ask for more than the authority, in his own discretion, to impose and revoke, and to modify and adjust, embargoes upon our foreign commerce. Not only are such embargoes never contemplated as friendly measures but they are radically inconsistent with the avowed theory of the present administration that existing commercial restrictions constitute the chief menace to peace. * * * Therefore, to commit to the Executive the power in his discretion to adopt and prosecute measures that naturally lead to war, is virtually to transfer to him the power to make war, so that the formal declaration by Congress of the existence of a state of war would become an essentially perfunctory act.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Members of the House do not agree with me, after reading letters from their constituents, that the people who call themselves pacifists, but who want to keep this country at peace no more than we, are constantly changing their point of view as to what will help preserve the peace of this country.

A few years ago the so-called pacifists used to write me that they wanted such and such legislation with such and such provisions, and now today the letters that come to me are to the effect, "We have studied the Pittman bill, we have studied the McReynolds bill, and we are not sure which bill we prefer, but we want the measure that is most likely to keep us out of war." More and more, Mr. Chairman, we, the people of America, are realizing the blessings of America, the freedom of race, the freedom to worship God as we see fit, the freedom to send our children to the schools to which we wish to send them, and there is a feeling that we want to keep away as far as possible from the policies of other governments. It is my belief that if we waited 3 months—nay, if we waited even 2 months—the Congress of the United States would do nothing more than reenact the present legislation as being the safest and wisest course to pursue.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. The gentlewoman a moment ago said she wondered what the Secretary of State might think with reference to the passage of this bill, and what effect it might have on reciprocal-trade agreements. Does the gentlewoman say that she has heretofore supported those reciprocal-trade agreements?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. No; I have not supported them. I have felt that it is delegating power that belongs to Congress to someone else, to the Secretary of State or the President of the United States; but the Congress has voted that power, and that is the law. I have believed that we could have reciprocal-trade agreements, yes; but only after the Congress has debated and has ratified those agreements, as is its right, and I am sure that those reciprocal-trade agreements, under the McReynolds bill, would be nothing but a scrap of paper, so far as they are made with belligerent countries. Then, so far as the Pittman bill is concerned, we would help the powerful nations—like Japan on the Pacific and the powerful nation of England on the Atlantic—and would be manifestly unfair to other nations; and war will be brought closer and closer to our shores. I do not favor the Pittman bill. I would rather have the McReynolds bill than the Pittman bill.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield again?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Does not the gentlewoman remember the testimony of those from the State Department to the effect before our committee that the passage of the McReynolds bill would not in any way interfere with the reciprocal-trade agreements?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I do not remember that, but I do know this, that the Secretary of State did not appear before our committee, although I was very anxious to have him appear.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. He had his representatives there.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Yes; but they did not speak for him in the reciprocal-trade agreement, I find, and, Mr. Chairman, I talked with the State Department yesterday and find that no one can speak for the Secretary of State in that matter. I discussed it with a number of people at the Department. Dr. Sayre, the able Assistant Secretary of State, as we all know, has the direct handling of agreements, does all the routine work of those agreements, and those agreements are signed by the Secretary alone, and from numerous discussions with the State Department I realize that those treaties, those "measures for peace", as Secretary Hull calls them, are the nearest and dearest to the heart of the Secretary of State; and then again, to come back to a discussion of the other part of the bill——

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Not now; I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman who has made such a study of international problems and who has contributed so much to our discussions in a moment. It seems to me it is manifestly unfair to our own shipping interests to give the President the discretion to decide under such regulations as he shall prescribe whether we shall send commodities in American ships or prohibit them entirely from carrying them. During the World War I find that goods sent to Europe were consigned to people who had already acquired the title to them, that is, foreign purchasers.

That regulation was, in fact, in existence then, but it did not keep us out of war. I think our people would feel very bitterly—those in agriculture, those in industry, and those in the merchant marine, and they would have the right to so feel—if we allowed Japanese ships to carry our commodities of war to the Orient and British ships to carry American commodities to the countries of Europe, Great Britain in particular, while our ships were lying idle at the wharves. We have tried to build up a merchant marine not only for the development of our trade but as an adjunct to the Navy. We are not willingly going to see those ships in disuse if possible. We are not willingly going to see our people walking the streets, knowing full well our workers in agriculture, in the cotton fields, and the workers in industry and in the mills are idle while the workers of the other nations are getting this trade. Then, also, even if we give up our trade, it is not going to keep us out of war. It may well bring us into war.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot be accused of partisanship in this matter, because ever since I came to Congress I have favored the same policy—reenactment of the present law, keeping out of entangling alliances, doing everything in our power to keep the peace at home and the peace of the world abroad. It was the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] who spoke of the Prince of Peace. I know the need of a spiritual revival in this country and all over the world, but until that day comes we must be prepared to keep our own people safe and our own flag flying with honor. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the subject of neutrality, as I see it, is a state of mind. Neutrality is a problem which deals primarily with human nature and human emotions. The best legislation, the best restrictive codes in the world cannot prevent the American people from going to war if the American people want war. If the American people decree in years to come that we shall go to war, we will do so, the best neutrality act ever legislated by man notwithstanding. If the American people decree that we shall not go to war at any time or at any cost, we will not do so. I say that in formulating neutrality legislation the best we can hope to do is to focus the attention of the American people on those things which lead us to war, those things which tempted us into the last war, and by focusing the attention of our Nation on those things we hope to prevent America from ever taking sides in European conflicts particularly.

Those things which urge people to take sides are considered in this bill. I would like to call your attention particularly to this one fact, that neutrality is bound to cost somebody something. Anything that is worth while in this world costs something. This Congress must decide if they are to appropriate in the future huge sums for purposes of war, or if we are to appropriate sums for the purposes of peace. That is the real question which is before us now. Somebody must pay for neutrality. Everybody pays for war. I say that if there is any local industry or any local interest that will suffer because of this neutrality act, it will be far better in the future to subsidize that industry or that interest rather than to plunge the whole Nation into war.

I call your attention to the fact that the World War lasted approximately 18 months for us. We were actively engaged in that war for 18 months, and the cost to the United States is $41,000,000,000 today, and that cost is still mounting. Compare that, if you will, with our total exports in dollar value last year. Our total exports in 1936 amounted to a little over $2,453,000,000 in a 12 months' period. That is all our total exports amounted to in dollars. It was a little over 39,000,000 tons. Of that total tonnage, a little more than 10,000,000 tons were carried in our own bottoms. You can readily appreciate, then, that the amount of American goods actually carried in American vessels was very small, and certainly it is infinitesimal, compared to the cost of the World War to the people of this country.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] stated several days ago that this bill would ruin the American merchant marine. I submit it would be far better to keep the American merchant marine here in our home ports than to have it blown out of the water by belligerents, or it would be far less costly to subsidize it while we kept it at home rather than to incur the risk of another war as costly as the last one.

It has also been stated that the granting of discretionary power to the President of the United States on commodities other than munitions of war is bound to hurt our peacetime trade. I doubt very much if that is true. You know and I know that the foreign nations of this world which deal with us today do not do so because they like us particularly or for any sentimental reasons.

They deal with us because they receive in return quality material at low prices, and it is profitable for them to do so. They deal with us for purely selfish reasons, because it is to their advantage to do so. Regardless of this neutrality act it will still be to their advantage to deal with the United States in times of peace. I doubt very much if our peacetime trade will suffer one iota because of the restrictions which we are setting up in this neutrality bill.

I would further like to call attention to a statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] when he stated that the granting of this discretionary power to the President amounted to the granting of war-declaring power. That is a rather far-fetched statement. The moment Congress passes this neutrality bill we are declaring to the nations of the world that we have granted to our Chief Executive, the President of the United States, the power in time of war to declare an embargo on certain commodities. We are telling the world in advance what we intend to do. In no way can this be interpreted as changing the rules in the midst of the game.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Does the gentleman have reference to section 4, paragraph (d), which specifically provides that the President may change, modify, or revoke from time to time?

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. I had reference to a statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] that this grant actually gives the President the power to declare war. I emphatically deny that it in any way grants that power, because we are announcing to the world in advance exactly what we intend to do. That is not changing the rules in the midst of the game. I would rather not yield further until I have finished.

This whole subject of neutrality is so baffling and so complex that we must give someone discretionary power, and there are no better hands in which to place it than in the hands of the President of the United States.

I believe that a careful study of this problem will convince you of that fact. The problem requires flexibility. Mandatory provisions would impose unnecessary hardships on American industry and on the American people. By granting discretionary power we hope to insure neutrality and at the same time to insure the greatest domestic and foreign commerce compatible with the maintenance of neutrality. That is the whole point. We do not want to impose unnecessary hardship on American industry or on the American people. The minute you pass mandatory legislation you make it impossible for the President of the United States to do otherwise than undermine the complete industrial structure of our Nation once he has declared a state of war to exist.

A study of world conditions over the past few years shows that there are minor wars, wars between nations having no navies, and wars where only one or two exportable items are involved. I refer here particularly to the Italo-Ethiopian war of a year ago, where oil was the only article which would have involved us in any possible trouble. If mandatory legislation had existed at that time the President of the United States would have been obliged to declare restrictions on shipments of all commodities when actually oil was the only item involved, or the only item in which the warring nations were interested. So we must consider that fact as of the utmost importance, that there are varying degrees of warfare, that there are wars between nations having no navies where we could not possibly be affected. Mandatory legislation under this condition would impose terrible hardships upon American industry.

There seems to be a prevailing idea among certain Members of this House that the McReynolds bill gives the President power to discriminate between two warring nations. This is absolutely not true. The President's acts under this bill apply to both warring nations or to all warring nations. There is no such thing in this bill as granting discretion to the Executive or to anyone else to declare the aggressor nation or to discriminate between warring nations.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Not for the moment.

I also call attention to section 5, which seems to have been under considerable fire during the past few days. It appears on page 23 of the bill before us. Some people have a tendency to feel that this section would prohibit private organizations such as the Red Cross, charitable organizations, religious organizations from collecting funds in this country for the sufferers in warring nations, to collect funds for medical supplies. That is absolutely not a fact. If you will read section 5 carefully, you will see that it applies only to governments, to representatives of governments, or to subdivisions of governments. It in no way applies to private charitable organizations such as the Red Cross, and would not prohibit them from contributing funds to the sufferers in a warring nation. During the hearings on the neutrality bill certain witnesses appeared before us representing organizations which in my opinion are doing more at this time to involve America in war than any others. We must fight to keep such organizations from taking sides, from organizing the American people into groups which will take sides with one faction or another, or with one nation or another. That is the very thing that stirs up passions and war instincts, and it is the thing which we must struggle against. These are the factors which contribute to war, not grants of discretionary power to our Chief Executive. I know many people have ideas of their own on this neutrality issue, but I tell you that if you will think it through to a conclusion you will usually find that you have run up a blind alley and come to a dead end. [Applause.]

Careful reflection will convince you that the McReynolds bill is the most logical and constructive step which has yet been taken to insure neutrality to the United States. It is a pioneering effort in legislation which is comparatively new in its purpose. Experience and experience alone will teach us wherein it is weak. Remember that it can be changed and amended if necessary in future months. It is my earnest hope that this Congress will pass the bill now without amendment and give it the opportunity which it rightfully deserves.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman and colleagues, Gen. William T. Sherman, who made the famous march through Georgia to the sea in 1865, declared that "war is hell."

These few words graphically describe the horrors of war, with its destruction of the flower of the young manhood of the nation and their broken and maimed bodies, and property; and the grief and sorrow it entails upon the noncombatants.

No one could love peace and hate war more than I do. I am anxious not only for the people of our own country but for the people of the world to have peace. It always thrills me to read the chorus of the heavenly host to the shepherds on the Judean hills, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men, for unto you is born this day a Savior", and the consoling statement of the Prophet Isaiah, in which he said that the time will come when men will make war no more and they will turn their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks.

I understand the general purpose of the Pittman neutrality bill that passed the Senate and the McReynolds bill before us and now under consideration is, according to the proponents of these bills, to keep our country out of war. This is a most laudable purpose, and I am in full accord with the objectives sought. However, the important question that presents itself to the Congress and the Nation is, Will either one of these measures accomplish this purpose?

This is not—at least, it should not be—a partisan issue. I strongly commend the objectives, yet I am sure it is not out of place to discuss fully and question the means of attaining those objectives. Some very distinguished advocates of peace in the Senate, BORAH and others, and in the House, Mr. FISH, Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts, and others of the Foreign Affairs Committee, are of the opinion that these measures will get us into war, rather than keep us out. I desire to lend my support and vote to such amendments that may be offered to the bill before us and to the passage of the bill that offers the greatest promise of keeping us out of war and tends toward world peace. All of us here passed through the great World War. We still remember how heavily the clouds hung over this Nation from April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918, with the great destruction of lives and property. It is generally agreed that the great World War cost at least $240,000,000,000 in money. It brought about the death of 9,000,000 men and 9,000,000 others were crippled, maimed, or broken in health of the flower of the young manhood in the armed forces of the various nations engaged, and it created some 15,000,000 to 20,000,000 widows and orphans; and who can describe or measure the sorrow, grief, and distress that was experienced by the fathers, mothers, wives, brothers, sisters, and sons and daughters? Before we will have finished with the World War, including compensations, pensions, hospitalization, and so forth, it will have cost us at least $100,000,000,000. Think of it—this hundred billions of dollars would have provided a $5,000 home with a general warranty deed to 20,000,000 families, and that would mean homes for more than 80,000,000 of our population. It is now generally accepted that the great depression through which we have been passing is a part of the backwash of the great World War.

I recall as vividly as if it were yesterday when the news was flashed around the world that the armistice was signed and the people of the nations had ceased to slaughter each other. It was the greatest thrill of ecstasy I had ever experienced in my whole life. [Applause.]

The battle cry on the side of the allied nations was that "We were making the world safe for democracy and that this would end all wars." President Wilson brought to us the League of Nations document with the assurance that it would end wars and insure world peace. While many of us did not agree with his plan, yet we applauded his high purpose. Time has proven the futility of that plan and has established the wisdom and foresight of those in our country who opposed and defeated it. The makers and signers of that great document have violated it with impunity as their interests appeared. The most earnest advocates of the League of Nations in 1920, including the present President of the United States, and the Democratic Party, no longer urge our entry into the League of Nations. In fact, they have time and again assured the American people that they would take no such step. The League of Nations meant that we would join actively into the affairs of the 50 or more nations of the world. It was a direct and positive entangling alliance against which Washington warned this Nation in his Farewell Address.

The Pittman and McReynolds so-called neutrality bills now under consideration swing to the opposite extreme. If these bills represent the policy of the Democratic Party, then the policy of that party is diametrically opposed to that adopted by it in 1920, as these bills urge a policy of complete isolation, not only in matters of government but in matters of commerce, business, and so forth.

Of course, I was opposed to the entrance of this Nation into the League of Nations, and I am still opposed to making alliances with foreign nations. The safe course is to still adhere to the admonitions of Washington, crystalized in the Monroe Doctrine—"Friendship for all and entangling alliances with none."

The measure before us surrenders the freedom of the seas and may lead to the great injury of American commerce upon which the producers and workers in agriculture, industry, and commerce depend for support.

With Senator BORAH, Senator JOHNSON, and our colleagues, Mr. FISH, Mrs. ROGERS, and others, I question the wisdom of parts of either one of these bills. I am very much in favor of taking the profits out of war and I favor legislation with teeth in it that will effectively take the profits out of war. The prophet, Habbakkuk, tells us "Woe to him that buildeth a town with blood, and establishes a city by iniquity." I am opposed to our country exchanging the blood of the young manhood of America and the tears of the fathers, mothers, widows, and orphans for gold. That is what the profits of war mean.

Our laws should provide for the calling to the colors in time of war the dollars of this Nation, as well as the flesh and blood. It is unfair to send our young men to sacrifice and die while dollars and property remain at home to profiteer. We should be in no war unless it is a war of justice and national defense, and then each and all of us should do our part. It is unfair for a part of us to have all the patriotism and the other part to have all the money. [Applause.] If it is known that the dollars and property will be called to the colors, as well as the flesh and blood of this country, there is less likelihood of war, and when the war is over we will not have accumulated a stupendous debt such as we did at the end of the World War of more than $26,000,000,000.

THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE

I think this administration should have long ago called a conference and should have persisted in the course and should now urge a conference of the nations for a reduction of armies and navies. Some say we tried that once. Yes; we tried it, and in my opinion, very successfully. It is not true that this Nation has never won a conference. I refer to one conference in particular—the Washington Arms Conference held in the D. A. R. Hall in the city of Washington in 1921.

Following the war there was a race between many of the nations of the world to increase their armies, navies, and armaments. We had put on foot a movement in this country to substantially increase our Army and Navy over the pre-war period. In order to stop this scramble for bigger navies and bigger armies, President Harding through his then Secretary of State, the Honorable Charles Evans Hughes, who is now the distinguished and honored Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, called a disarmament conference at Washington.

It was my pleasure to be present as were other Members of the House and Senate, members of the Cabinet, high officers of the Army and Navy, diplomats from the various countries of the world, and many other distinguished representatives of the great powers of the earth. I shall never forget the thrilling experience when Secretary Hughes, in a most eloquent appeal, indicted war and the policy of a mad race in increasing the instrumentalities of death and increasing the load of the already burdened people of the world, and urged the conference to act and act then. His announcement so electrified that great group of men and women from all parts of the world that they jumped to their feet instantaneously with applause and cheering.

This appeal for sanity and world peace struck a responsive chord of all mankind. That conference set about and did formulate what was known as the Washington Disarmament Treaty, and stopped the mad race and competition in the building of the navies of Japan, Italy, France, England, and the United States. By the terms of this conference, it expired in 1930, and was renewed at the request of President Hoover. It made a real contribution to the peace of the world, and for 12 or 15 years there was no real threat of a race for armaments or in navies, or of another world war.

That Disarmament Conference saved the American taxpayers at least $4,000,000,000, and it lifted the tax burden from the shoulders of the people of the leading nations of the world.

That meeting, the great speech of Secretary Hughes, and the response of that great audience was the greatest thrill that I have ever received during my many years of service in the United States House and Senate. [Applause.]

ADMINISTRATION SHOULD CALL DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE

The Treaty of Washington, with its supplement of 1930 expired last year, and the world has set in again on a mad race for supremacy in producing implements of death on land and sea, in the air, and under the sea. Italy through its dictator, Mussolini, has ordered military training for the Italian children, beginning with boys 8 years of age, and this training will continue until they reach the age of 55. Italy now claims that she can call to the colors almost immediately 7,000,000 fighting men, and this number is growing. Italy also claims supremacy in the air with her thousands of planes and under the seas with her submarines. Russia, under her dictator, not to be outdone, orders her children, beginning with boys 8 years of age, to be trained for war, regimented in groups, companies, and battalions, and she claims that she could bring many millions of trained men into instant action. We find Germany under her dictator, Hitler, following along with Italy and Russia. Great Britain announces to the world that she will spend for her naval development alone in 5 years $7,500,000,000. France is borrowing huge sums of money to increase her army and navy. Poland is spending fabulous sums, and Japan is doubling her air force, her navy, and increasing her army. According to conservative estimates, these nations will spend during the calendar year 1937, $13,000,000,000 on their military and naval establishments. What a tremendous burden of taxes this will place upon the backs of the people of these nations!

Our Nation for the year 1937 will spend approximately $1,000,000,000 for national defense and agencies allied thereto. This means approximately $8 in taxes for every man, woman, and child in this land and in the neighborhood of $40 for every family in this land, and the consumers, whether rich or poor, high or low, millionaire or widow, the orphan or well-to-do, must carry their share of this burden; in fact, the big end of these taxes must be paid and will be paid by the common people, the working people of this Nation.

Prior to the World War tremendous sums were spent by European nations in increasing their armies and navies. They were preparing for a world war. These same European nations will spend two or three times as much this year as they did during the year prior to the beginning of the World War in 1914. What does all this increase of armaments mean? It points to one result, and one result alone, unless these efforts are halted, and that is a superworld war. The next war will be upon a much larger and wider scale, with a much greater destruction of life and property, with attendant suffering and misery.

Whether we have war or not, these immense armament expenditures must eventually break down the living standards of the people of this Nation and the world. With all this threat of war that has been going on about us, this administration has made no effort whatever, so far as I can learn, to check it. Why has not this administration called and urged a disarmament conference and why does it not do so now? These nations that are making such extensive preparations for war owe us in the neighborhood of $12,000,000,000 that we took from the taxpayers of this country to loan them to save them and, as we believed, the civilization of the world, yet who has heard of this administration making any real demand on these nations to pay these honest debts? They will spend more this year on armies, navies, and armaments than would pay the debt due to our country.

The President and the American people have everything to gain and nothing to lose in calling and urging such a conference. This would do more to bring about the peace of our own country and the world than anything else that could be done. These various countries have been gripped with fear. They are all deeply in debt. It seems to me if the proper approach was made that they would desire to relieve their own people of the tremendous burden they are putting on their backs and promote peace for themselves and the world; but the President does go to South America, in which there is no threat to world peace or threat of war or rumor of war, and holds a peace conference merely among the governments of the Western Hemisphere.

America, with her prestige and powerful influence among the nations, should put it squarely up to these saber-rattling dictators and other nations that if they desire to retain the friendship and esteem of the American people they must pay their honest debts and cease their threats to the peace of the world.

STOP SHIPMENT OF ARMS AND ARMAMENTS

I favor making it unlawful to sell or ship arms and armaments or war materials to any belligerent or belligerent nations engaged in war, and I favor prohibiting American citizens from traveling on the high seas on ships of belligerent nations. I think this should be the permanent and mandatory policy of this Government for two reasons: One is to promote the peace of our own country and the world, and the other is, I am opposed to our Nation fishing gold or profits out of "blood and tears." We did that very thing during the World War. This is building a nation in blood.

There is serious opposition, in my own mind, as well as many others, to section 4 of the bill before us. In the first place, it gives to the President autocratic powers in his discretion over both our domestic and foreign commerce so far as commodities other than armaments and war materials are concerned. I am unwilling to give all of this discretion and power to this President or any other President. His action might involve us in war and might destroy our domestic and foreign commerce in nonwar commodities, disrupt our commerce, industry, and agriculture, and force tens and tens of millions of people out of employment, and this might create a very serious situation in itself in this country. The power delegated to the President in section 4, I think, should be retained by Congress and the American people. This is permanent legislation. No one can know now a situation that might confront the American Nation within the next 12 months or 2 years. Keep this matter of nonwar commodities open to be dealt with when the situation arises, and then we may judge better the implications of our actions.

Will we surrender freedom of the seas? The Pittman and McReynolds bills surrender the freedom of the seas. Now, if we surrender the freedom of the seas, will it promote war or lessen the chances of war? Prior to 1812 the British nation and one other nation practically drove our commerce from the seas. They boarded our ships, searched them, and in other ways harassed our commerce on the seas. President Jefferson insisted upon our right to freedom of the seas just as any other nation. We fought the War of 1812 to vindicate that right as asserted by Thomas Jefferson and the American Congress. The wonderful victory of Perry on Lake Erie and the great triumph of General Jackson at New Orleans, and the dying declaration of Captain Lawrence, "Don't give up the ship", are the outstanding glories of that war, which established once and for all our right of the freedom of the seas. [Applause.] Now, the seas are the highways of the world. Both of these bills surrender that American right. Now, if we announce to the world that we surrender the freedom of the seas, and when any trouble comes up in the future that our warships and merchant ships will be ordered into American harbors and bays, will it not be accepted by the world either as evidence of weakness or cowardice, or both, on the part of this Nation? Weakness and cowardice never did keep an individual out of a fight or a nation out of war. We have spent upward of a billion dollars to create and enlarge the American merchant marine. We have spent billions of dollars to create a navy second to none in the world. If this bill is to be adopted and we are to surrender our freedom of the seas, why spend all of this money for a merchant marine and the Navy? We must bear in mind that the nations of the world are not the idealists we are. They have in the past treated their treaties and solemn engagements as scraps of paper. Now, if we are going to announce to them that in no event will we protect our commerce and our merchant ships, will they have any hesitation forcing such an intolerable condition upon us that it will be necessary for us to act?

President Wilson in 1916 sought reelection for the Presidency on the slogan, "He kept us out of war", and he declared over and over, "We are too proud to fight." Did these beautiful idealistic declarations keep us out of war? They certainly did not. This Nation, if it is really neutral, can stay out of war, and if it had been really neutral it could and would have kept out of the World War. The thing that got us into the World War was we were not neutral. We early took sides with the Allies. I want our Nation to be neutral in these foreign wars.

England got us into the World War. We were delivering our commodities to the Allied Powers—Italy, France, England, Japan, and so forth. We at the same time, in the beginning, were delivering our commodities to Amsterdam and Rotterdam in Holland on the North Sea. These commodities found their way from Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and other ports on the North Sea to Germany and other central powers in the early part of the World War. Now, the North Sea was as much a part of the highways of the world as the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. In order to prevent our commodities from reaching Germany and other Central Powers through Amsterdam and Rotterdam and other cities, England in council issued an order that our ships and other ships should not sail the North Sea and deliver these commodities and other materials that would eventually reach the Central Powers. In order not to ruffle England's feelings we backed off the North Sea, and by that very act we either showed our partiality to England and the other allied Governments or cowardice. What effect did it have on Germany and the Central Powers? They reasoned that we were not neutral, that through the request of Great Britain we would not deliver foodstuff and other materials for their hungry population, but we were pouring food and other war materials into the allied countries. Therefore, Germany thought she would try her hand on backing us off the seas, and she attempted to drive us from the Atlantic with her ruthless submarine policies. She sank the Lusitania, as well as other ships, but it turned out that the Lusitania was loaded with contraband of war. We were not neutral. Our partiality for the allied governments, or our fear of being involved in a war, hurried us into the World War. Switzerland, a small nation, was surrounded by the warring nations during the World War. That country is so small that the great Bertha guns could throw one of its great projectiles entirely across it. Switzerland did not get into the World War. They said they were neutral and they were neutral. We were 3,000 miles away from Europe. If we had been neutral, we could have and would have remained out of the World War, and if we are really neutral, in my opinion, we can stay out of future foreign wars.

My contention is that this measure before us will develop the very same situation that drew us into the World War.

CASH AND CARRY POLICY

This bill provides that unless they come in submarines or armored merchant ships warring nations can come to our seaports, buy commodities, pay for them, and take them away. Food is quite as important in winning a war as ships and guns.

Napoleon declared that "armies march on their bellies." Now let us suppose that Japan is involved in a war with China, Russia, and some other countries in the Pacific. She has a great navy, with a great fleet of merchant ships. Under this bill she could come to the Pacific coast and get all the supplies she might need to care for her army, navy, and population. Russia, China, and other nations more than likely would not be able to come with ships. We would at once be favoring Japan over China, Russia, and other nations in the Pacific. Japan might be in the wrong. She might be engaged in a war of aggression and oppression. Her success might menace our own Nation. Does anyone believe that Russia would submit to this situation? Russia has thousands and thousands of up-to-date airplanes. Might not Russia start a great fleet of airplanes traveling across the Bering Strait and come down the western coast of the Pacific to Seattle, Portland, San Francisco, and other Pacific coast ports and engage in great battles from the air, and she might, under the belief that it was saving the life of her own nation, bombard the great stores of commodities that we might be about to turn over to the Japanese ships. We might by this bill bring an attack upon our coast and bring the war to our very door.

Now suppose that England and France should engage in war against Italy, Germany, and some other countries. England and France with their great navies more than likely would dominate the Atlantic Ocean. Under this bill, because they have the cash and the ships to carry the products, they could come to New York, Boston, Baltimore, and other Atlantic seaports and buy great quantities of food and clothing. Of course, this would enrage the nations with whom they might be at war.

Italy claims to be the master of the air and of submarine warfare. She has thousands and thousands of up-to-date bombing planes and a great fleet of submarines. Germany and Russia have tremendous resources in modern airships.

Suppose these nations should attempt to thwart the purpose of Great Britain and France and should patrol our Atlantic coastline or fly over our cities in which were stored great quantities of food, clothing, and other commodities not armaments, and would seek to destroy them with their airships or with their submarines and bring the war right to our very door on the Atlantic.

What I am trying to point out is that under this bill Japan in the Pacific and England and France in the Atlantic would be our customers, whether we desired it or not, in a world war. They could keep the ships from other nations from reaching our coast to buy our commodities. This would in the very nature of things destroy in spirit, if not in letter, the so-called neutrality proposition provided in this bill, and would bring about, in my opinion, the same condition that really pulled us into the World War.

Bear in mind that this bill provides that these belligerent nations can buy commodities here provided they do not come in armed merchant ships or submarines. To carry the commodities they would bring their merchant ships unarmed, but no doubt war merchant ships would be convoyed by their battleships and submarines.

I am raising the question, Would not it be much less likely of getting us into war if we still insisted upon freedom of the seas and deliver our farm products and other products—not armaments—in American ships to those who desire to purchase our products?

I favor a real neutrality in the event of war. I do not desire our country to take sides with either or any belligerent. We furnished billions of dollars and millions of wonderful young men in the World War believing that we were promoting the freedom of the world and saving civilization. These nations all, except little Finland, have proved themselves to be ungrateful, and there is more autocracy, oppression, dictatorships in the world today than there were when we entered the World War, and the world, including our country, is worse off today. This is the situation that grieves me deeply, and I do not wish to cast any vote that will in any way involve this country in another world war. The world must know that we seek nothing but our own. We are the most powerful nation of the world. We crave peace, but at the same time we have billions to defend our own shores and our own people, and not one dollar and not one American boy for any other nation of the world. Not one dollar nor one American boy to aid these nations that promote strife and world war. [Applause.]

WHAT ABOUT AGRICULTURE AND INDUSTRY?

This measure does give the President extraordinary powers. In the exercise of his judgment he might do the very thing that would involve us in war. I am not referring to the present occupant of the White House, but any President. There is a feeling abroad in the land that if we have another great war the people of this Nation should have more opportunity to express themselves. War means grief, sorrow, and distress for the big majority of our people. While Congress has the power, under the present Constitution, to declare war, neither the President nor Congress can fight these wars. The mothers and fathers of this Nation must furnish the boys and girls to sacrifice and die for their country. How can we now, looking down through the years, say what nations might be engaged in war, how this war might affect our population, and what ought to be done and what ought not to be done? I am sure that Congress and the American people can and will decide wisely the best thing for this country to do, if and when war should come and those conditions arise, but I am in favor now of writing into law and making it mandatory that we cannot sell or deliver to any nation engaged in war any guns or other war materials, and that American citizens should be prohibited from traveling on the ships of any of the warring nations. But I wish to reserve for the decision of the Congress and the American people what we shall do in the operation of our merchant ships and the selling of our commodities when and if any war should come.

We would find it very difficult to find employment for our citizens in commerce, industry, and agriculture if we should take our ships off the seas and refuse to sell our commodities from the farms, factories, mines, mills, and shops. It might throw out of employment from twenty to fifty million people. Let us not overlook the threat that would mean to our country. If the issue should arise as to whether or not we should create a condition like that in this country, I want to leave the question open and let it be decided by Congress and the American people at that time. Therefore, while I favor the mandatory provisions of this bill for prohibiting the sale and furnishing of armaments and other war materials to warring nations and favor prohibiting American citizens traveling on the ships of warring nations, I am not in favor of section 4 of the McReynolds bill giving to the President this great discretionary power, and saying to the world that we surrender the freedom of the seas and depend upon the sale of our comomdities solely to the nations that have big enough navies to meet the cash-and-carry provisions of this bill, and say to the nations of the world that we will take our great Navy and merchant marine, "tuck our tails and run." In my opinion, this section 4 is fraught with great possibilities of war, the very thing we are trying to prevent.

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. IZAC].

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, I believe my colleagues have covered very well the various provisions of this bill; however, there is just one angle which they have not approached, and I would like to speak for a few minutes on that.

First, I am going to tell you a story which would be very funny if it were not so tragic. Many years ago there was a bold, brave President. The gentleman from New York said, "Thank God, we had a man with the courage of that President, because he called a disarmament conference."

When he called this disarmament conference, at first nobody came. Then finally a few did come. After they sat around the conference table they found they could not agree, but to save the face of the administration this is what happened: Orders went down to the naval conferees of the United States: "You will have to agree, so that we may have disarmament."

I want to tell you in a few words just what happened. Oh, they all threw in some of the old ships. They all threw in some of the things that did not count, that could not be used, anyway. Then it came time to say what each would throw into the pot in the interest of world peace. England had four of the most beautiful blueprints you ever laid eyes on. They were blueprints of super battle cruisers. Can you imagine a super battle cruiser? But there they were, four big, beautiful blueprints.

Japan had six ships with the keels laid. Japan said, "Well, I do not like to throw in something against nothing, but I am willing to throw out those six keels, provided the United States will also throw out all of her construction."

We had in those days 13 of the most magnificent men-of-war on the ways that the world has ever seen, battle cruisers and battleships, but in the interest of international peace we agreed to throw all of them away. True, we converted a couple into carriers, but as to most of them—and they ranged from 4 to 76 percent completed—we threw them away in the interest of international peace; 13 beautiful ships against 6 keels of Japan and 4 blue prints of Great Britain.

This is only a matter of history, Mr. Chairman; but the sequel is yet to come.

Ten years afterward, 10 of those 12 long years, we found we had laid down only 31 ships, most of them auxiliaries, not fighting men-of-war. In other words, we took a rest. We said, "Fine; we will save $4,000,000,000 in maintenance of the Navy. We will permit Andy Mellon to save $10,000,000,000 and reduce the national debt. We will just take a little recess in this and see what it does to international peace."

While we did this, here is what happened in the other nations:

Japan built 142 vessels of war, Great Britain built 112, and we built 31. One of these 31 was a submarine. Great Britain built 24 submarines and Japan 38.

I do not mind disarming. I would like to disarm if everybody else would do likewise. But what kind of a business is it to disarm when nobody else disarms?

Then at the end of these 12 long years we find the present President of the United States faced with this problem: The President wants a disarmament policy, a long-range neutrality policy, a policy that will give us peace. They are not exactly synonymous. But you cannot have any disarmament policy, you cannot have any international policy, unless you are able to back up such policy with something besides scrapped battleships.

I hear people say, "Freedom of the seas." I wonder if anyone knows what this means? For us to maintain the freedom of the seas would mean that we would have to be able to place in any part of the seven seas a naval force superior to that of any other nation or combination of nations.

Do not let us be foolish about this thing. There is one thing we can do. We can adopt a neutrality policy as this bill provides, and we can back up this neutrality policy with a navy equal to the navy of any other nation—not superior to the navy of any one nation or superior to the navies of any combination of nations. We cannot send these ships all over the face of the earth keeping the peace of all nations, but we can get by if we will keep our own Navy in our own waters, in our own strategic sphere, and deny the use of these waters to other powers if they insist on going to war. This, to my mind, is the crux of our policy. Why have we heard here during the last week our colleagues complaining against an appropriation of half a billion dollars for the Navy? Because we got so far behind we are not even in the running now. We are on our way, yes; and eventually we will catch up with Great Britain and Japan. This is all I ask. When we are on a par with the other two navies we do not need to worry about their coming over here and bothering us.

But let us not get our fingers burned. Let us keep our fleet in our own territorial waters. Let us lay down a long-term policy of neutrality, as this bill provides.

When I speak of strategic waters I mean simply this: Let us look at the Pacific Ocean, for instance. The area from the peninsula of Alaska to the Hawaiian Islands and thence to the Canal Zone is the waters of no one else but ourselves. We can control these waters with a navy equal to the navy of any one power.

On the Atlantic coast, our strategic waters may be said to be embraced in the area from the northeast corner of the United States out to the middle of the Atlantic, perhaps, and maybe down as far as the Canal Zone. More than this we do not need. But if you look at your map, you will find that in asserting our rights in those waters we are not running foul of any other nation. We are not asking them to give up any of the prerogatives they exercise at the present time.

If they want to bring the fight to us, that is a different story. We can meet them; because if there were a combination of nations uniting against us, this is what would happen: Some other coalition would be formed in their own backyard to take their minds off our troubles. One single nation with a navy of a strength equal to ours could not come over here and practice aggression against our shores, because it would be operating from too great a distance.

Therefore, I say, if we really want to keep the peace of this Nation, it is a simple matter if we will first lay down a long-term policy of neutrality and say what we are going to do. I believe this bill does this.

It may be said, "Why, there are exceptions. It is discretionary." It is discretionary only so far as to make it possible for the President in time of war to restrict our commerce to the extent that such commerce is getting us into trouble. That is all, and no further than that.

The first thing we must do is to let the nations of the earth know, if they are so indifferent in this matter, if they care so little about the lives of their nationals, if they depend, as a policy, on going to war, we will have none of it and we are not going to permit our nationals or even our investments abroad to embroil us in war; and here is one way we can do this.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IZAC. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The gentleman's modesty, I am sure, would forbid his stating what I happen to know. The gentleman is a graduate of the United States Naval Academy and saw service in the World War and knows whereof he speaks. I simply wanted to make this statement for the benefit of those who do not know the gentleman's background.

Mr. IZAC. I heard the other day that you could drop bombs and sink all of our battleships, that you did not need any battleships, you did not need any cruisers, you did not need any destroyers; all you needed would be submarines; and someone else said, "No; you do not need them at all; you need airplanes."

Mr. Chairman, every one of these categories has its place in the scheme of naval things. No one category can displace any of the others; each is superior to all of the others in certain relationships; but you need them all, and if we do not have them and the other nation has them, you weaken our national defense.

I believe you are all agreed that we should have an adequate national defense. If we have this, we are not going to bother about other nations, because we can paddle our own canoe. Someone said that, in fact, we did not need any Navy, because in the last war the Navy never fired a shot. Oh, I cannot let that go unheeded. We had 89 contacts, men-of-war contacts, in the World War. The transport service alone had 26 contacts. We sunk 2 submarines on the surface, 6 in the North Sea mine barrage, 5 in nets, and 27 either by mines or depth charges, and there were thousands of depth charges dropped during the war, thousands of gunshots fired by our naval escorts convoying our merchant ships across the sea. So you may rest assured that the Navy in every war has always given a good account of itself, and I am sure it is going to in the future if we will maintain it equal, at least, to the best that can be brought against us.

I see three features in this neutrality bill of ours that I believe determine our position on a long-range policy. First, there is the mandatory provision on arms and munitions of war. If you will read the hearings, you will find that practically every organization and individual that came before the committee asked for this. I believe they are all satisfied.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, it is hard to fight a foreign war. It will not be necessary if we keep our fleet in our own territorial waters, if we will have a long-range policy of neutrality, and if we will get the minds of the people made up to the fact that you cannot have peace unless you do away with these trade differences. If you insist on "trade as usual" in time of war, I am going to promise you that you are going to have "war as usual." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and Members, properly, a discussion of the neutrality bill should include a most searching examination into the relationship of our Navy to the maintenance of peace. I am sorry we could not have considered neutrality legislation prior to the discussion of appropriation bills for any of the armed services of the Nation. Last week I listened with impatience to some of the most misleading statements on our Navy that I believe have ever been made on the floor of this House.

Had the neutrality bill been under discussion instead of the Navy bill at that time, I am sure the personnel of this House would have had a much better understanding, not only of the needs of the Navy but the needs of the country for a navy as well as the need for a real policy of neutrality. Knowing that we were soon to consider the neutrality bill—the bill before us today—I contented myself by taking a few notes of what transpired during the debate upon the Navy bill, and I determined then that I would try to clarify some of the things about which my colleagues apparently were misinformed.

I was especially anxious that my first words on the floor of the House of Representatives should be uttered in the interests of peace, rather than give the impression that because a Navy bill was under consideration I was therefore a man of war. May I preface my remarks by saying that the strongest adherents of peace in this Nation today are the people who passed through the fire of the last war and those who are preparing themselves against the wars of the future. The officers and men forming the personnel of our Navy today are more vitally interested in the maintenance of peace than any of us on the floor of this House, because they know that in the present temper of the Nation's people there is not going to be any foreign war in which we send our boys across the seas, but that if war is brought against us they of the Navy will form the first line of defense and therefore be compelled to bear the brunt of the first attack.

In the consideration of this neutrality bill, we found that most individuals as well as organizations were satisfied with the assurance that we would place therein a provision for a mandatory embargo on arms and munitions of war. That has been done and we have further provided for a progressive tightening of restrictions against foreign trade in time of war as the danger of our embroilment therein progressively increased. The aim has been simply to permit trade only so long as it did not endanger our peace.

I am of the opinion that if we will adopt this neutrality legislation as a continuing policy of government, if we will pass legislation, now, completely depriving everyone of profits in time of war, if we will keep our Navy in our own waters, it will not be necessary to sacrifice the lives of Americans in another foreign war.

So inasmuch as my colleagues have been discussing for your benefit this question of neutrality from various viewpoints and in relation to economics, international relations, and so forth, I shall attempt to cover it from an entirely different angle, and to give you the conclusions I have reached from what experience and knowledge I have obtained during the past 25 years.

My friends, why battleships, why cruisers, why destroyers, why submarines? Simply because in modern naval warfare, each has its place, each performs its mission, and each alone would be at a certain disadvantage in regard to the others.

You could no more oppose a battleship with a cruiser than you could a boy with a slingshot to one with a .22 rifle. As long as navies are striving for supremacy, in conformity with their function as the first line of defense for their respective countries, no major navy can afford to be without one single arm that the necessity for which has already been demonstrated. When they talk about the Navy and then in the next breath about the air forces, they do not seem to realize that one of the arms of the Navy is the air force and that it functions just as do the submarines, the destroyers, and the other categories each of which fulfills a certain mission in time of war. The maintenance of an adequate Navy, I admit, is a tremendous price to have to pay to keep the peace, but I see no other way as long as other nations are found building up their military and naval strength thus becoming potential aggressors against our shores. It has been stated in the debate on the naval appropriations bill that we must be preparing against somebody and that we must fear some particular enemy and also that there was no danger of invasion.

My friends, as long as the American Navy is a navy of equal power to that of any other nation, I do not fear invasion; and a neutrality policy is possible to be developed into a potential factor for peace. But without that Navy, can anyone on this floor be so naive as to think that rich America would not some day be subject to the aggression of a foreign foe? Foreign invasion is possible without a navy. It is impossible with our Navy equal to any other navy. Some want us to junk all of our Navy and depend entirely on aircraft for defense. Aircraft is an especially effective arm of the Navy but just suppose we should depend entirely on aircraft and in case of a foreign invasion at the very time the enemy drew near, a heavy fog should settle over that part of the coast and all of the aircraft be grounded. Would not our aviation enthusiasts wish they had provided for some other means of defense?

Our Navy is continuously preparing for every contingency of which the human mind can conceive. More you cannot ask of any governmental service.

Now some also say we need no navy at all; because in the last war not one shot was fired by our Navy; that it is a useless luxury. I cannot permit that statement to go unchallenged. It will take but a minute to answer it.

There were 89 of our war vessels that actually contacted the enemy in the last war. The transport service alone had 26 contacts with the enemy. There were 2 enemy submarines sunk on the surface, 6 submarines were sunk in the northern mine barrage, 5 were lost in mine nets, and 27 by mines or depth charges. And the fact that no surface vessels were sunk was simply because there were no enemy surface vessels left on the Atlantic at the time America entered the war. Thousands of depth bombs were dropped by our men-of-war, and it was due to gunshot fire that the escorts of convoys, sometimes running to 40 or 50 ships, were able to protect their convoy by warding off the attacks of German submarines. As a matter of fact, were it not for the activity of the American Fleet, and especially the American destroyers, England, as well as France, might have been starved out before the American Army could be transported to France to add that final power that crushed the German Army.

But it is a difficult undertaking to carry the fight to an enemy thousands of miles away. For a defensive war and that is the role I want our Navy to play, we are soon to be, under present plans, the equal of any force that can be brought against us. But for taking the offensive, there is a different story to tell.

I visualize for the future a world conflict in which the powers of Europe, and of Asia also, take sides and form two hostile groups and fight a war to the death. We will be called on in this country to take sides against the aggressor. No one will be able to tell which is the aggressor. So then we will be asked to sell munitions and war materials to the group that controls the surface of the sea. Our answer, of course, will be "We cannot do it because that would not be in accordance with our neutrality laws." Whereupon they would send their ships to carry away commodities not yet declared munitions or war materials. They might even accede to our demand that they pay for them and take them away in their own bottoms. And even then, it might be difficult to stay out of their war.

For lying off our ports would probably be the submarines of the other coalition picking off these merchant vessels as, heavily laden, they put to sea from American ports. The war would be transported to our very front door and would be fought to the last pound of American produce.

We must realize that nations about to engage in a war for their very existence are pretty sure to be amply prepared in the way of guns and munitions. What they will need from the neutral countries are food supplies and commodities not usually associated with war. For wars are not fought with munitions alone. Every single thing that enters into the strengthening of a nation's resistance—wheat, potatoes—are just as vital as cannon and bombs. And think of what a small bit of explosive, such as fulminate of mercury, it takes to blot out a human life, whereas each human consumes several pounds of food stuffs per day.

Let us let foreign nations understand right now that if they want to fight and make this succession of wars a part of their policy, that they had better lay in a good supply not only of war munitions but of food before they decide on their usual resort to force.

There are $8,000,000,000 worth of foreign capital invested in American securities today. These will undoubtedly be converted into any kind of commodity, the exportation of which from our ports is still permissive as far as our neutrality legislation is concerned. If anyone thinks for one minute that the buying of $8,000,000,000 worth of supplies in time of international war will not be an incentive to war, then they do not read history. I fear only one thing and that is that the American people, when the crisis comes, may not have the courage to stand up and demand peace although it cost the last dollar of profits coming from international trade.

There are those, and we have repeatedly heard it in this discussion, who still talk of the "freedom of the seas." My friends, there is not any such animal. And it is well enough for these theorists to talk in that vein as long as someone else has to guarantee that freedom. And the only force you can depend on today for the guaranteeing of the freedom of the seas and keeping open even territorial waters is your Navy. And I want to say once and for all that those who glibly talk of freedom of the seas and at the same time balk at appropriating a half billion of dollars for the Navy, have no conception whatsoever of the magnitude of the job encompassed in these words "maintaining the freedom of the seas." To guarantee that policy would require a navy so large that it would in any part of the seven seas be able to bring to bear a force superior to that of any other nation or combination of nations. It is as childish as the statement "A million men will spring to arms over night."

The General Board of the Navy have asked for a navy as large as that of any other one nation; and I believe, in spite of the fact that the admirals are always held up to ridicule by those who have no knowledge of naval matters, you will all agree that the General Board is better qualified than any other group to direct the strategy of our naval forces.

Some contend that it would be better to have no navy at all than one inferior to a probable combination of navies; others say it would be better for Congress to set an appropriation of a certain number of millions of dollars, and then say to the General Board of the Navy, "Now, take this money and do the best you can with it." But I believe the vast majority of my colleagues, as well as of the people of this country, demand a navy as large as the largest possessed by any single nation, and for its efficiency we will depend upon the high caliber of the officers and men that man our ships.

And now I shall attempt to tell you why that, I believe, should be our policy: We believe that no combination against us is likely because, if one European or Asiatic nation should attempt to form a coalition against us, other nations in their own backyards would very likely take an opposing stand and thereby make possible the release for purposes of war of only a part of the resources of the coalition; and that if the fleet of one world power equally powerful with our own should attempt to invade our strategic waters, they could be readily repelled by our own naval forces functioning at a shorter distance from the home base. There, to my mind, is the crux of the whole policy of the United States as a member of the family of nations.

Now, the question is, What are our strategic waters? My friends, you can say with some degree of correctness that all those waters lying between the Canal Zone, the Hawaiian Islands, and the peninsula of Alaska lie within our strategic sphere as far as the Pacific is concerned. Likewise, on the East, while not so readily apparent, our strategic waters may be said to be embraced by that area stretching midway into the Atlantic from the Canal Zone to the northeastern extremity of the United States; and now I make this unqualified statement:

I have a belief that if we keep up our Navy equal to that of any other nation, we will be able to deny to the ships of any foreign power the use of those waters that I have just outlined and described as our own strategic sphere; and because of the fact that this does not interfere with the freedom of action of any other naval power in its strategic sphere, I am convinced that were we to keep our fleet in these waters it not only would give no offense to any foreign power but would practically nullify the chances of war, providing, of course, our neutrality policy was strictly determined in advance, as this bill contemplates, and is rigidly adhered to.

Some would go so far as to limit action of our Navy to, say, 300 or 500 miles off our coast. But I believe that by restricting our vessels of war to the Western Hemisphere, or, at least, to our own strategic sphere, we would be acting strictly defensively and at the same time could deny the use of those waters to the men of war of any other single navy, and with considerable hope of success.

I have noticed that racial and nationalistic enmities decrease as the square of the distance separating them. Can anyone doubt that the more or less routine dislike against us engendered in various people by the events of the last few years is at all comparable with the vivid hatreds existing between such next-door neighbors as Russia and Germany, for instance? Let us stay away from there or we will burn our fingers.

You will find in the bill under discussion perhaps the best legislation that could be enacted into law in view of the present restrictions placed on the size of our Navy and in view of the desirability of continuing trade as long as that may be done without danger of war.

In the first place, this bill provides a mandatory embargo on the shipment of arms and munitions to belligerent nations. Another provision makes it possible for a progressive embargo on the shipment of commodities when continued trade might endanger the peace of the Nation. And still another provides for a complete embargo on American shipping when that appears necessary likewise to keep us out of war. What exceptions are placed in the bill have been agreed to solely to make it possible that economic disturbances may be reduced to a minimum and that trade may be continued as long as there is no danger of such commerce threatening the peace of our country. Now practically, my friends, there is a state of mind that the American people are going to have to adopt, if we are to make this neutrality legislation mean peace legislation, and that is that our producers, our manufacturers, our labor, and our capital must realize that if they are going to insist on trade as usual in time of a great international conflict, then they must expect war as usual. Unless they are willing to give up the profits accruing to those temporarily profiting because of an international slaughter elsewhere, unless they are willing to give up trade as usual, and unless they make up their minds that the cost of blood and human lives is too great to exchange for the profits of industry and commerce, then it is ridiculous for us to waste our time here in Congress in trying to place on the statute books a neutrality law to keep the peace.

We may have to come to the complete embargo of all ocean-going commerce in case of a major international conflict. If we are willing to accept the depressed economic conditions as a result of this, we can still stay out of another war.

I believe it is possible by confining our ships to the Western Hemisphere to avoid a complete shut-down as would result from a complete embargo. We have a Navy that is capable of guarding our shipping in our own Western Hemisphere, but it is not sufficiently powerful nor numerous, as I have attempted to show you, to guard our investments, our nationals, and our commerce throughout the seven seas. To attempt to do that would be suicidal.

I have listened to so many pleas for peace on the score that those who suffered on Flanders fields may not have died in vain. Well, my attitude is "Why worry about our blood and our lives that are left on foreign soil? Those men died a hero's death. Do not worry about them. But you had better worry about their boys and their children's children and our children for whom they thought they had made the world safe against future catastrophes."

If you insist on freedom of the seas, you simply say to this generation, "My sons, we don't like to do it, but our pound of wheat and our pound of cotton, our pound of manufactures and our pound of shipping must receive its price."

So to your constituents and to mine, my colleagues, I direct these words, "Mr. Farmer, Mr. Munition Maker, Mr. Manufacturer, Mr. Laboring Man, when you are ready to say 'this depression is terrible. I have lost the material things for which I have worked, but I have saved my boy.' Then and only then is this Nation assured of peace."

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN].

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Connecticut 5 minutes.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, the subject we now have under consideration, that of formulating a permanent neutrality policy for the United States, is to my mind the most important subject that has come before the country during this session. The expression of interest from all parts of the country indicates that the American people want to be fully protected against the danger of involvement in a foreign war. It is important, therefore, that we consider any specific neutrality proposal from this viewpoint. Will the bill before us help keep this country out of war? If it will not, then the bill must be amended so as to provide the maximum protection against the danger of war. To do less than adopt the strongest possible program would, in my judgment, be a mistake.

Personally I would prefer a situation wherein the United States could act in concert with other nations of the world for the settlement of international disputes without recourse to war. I believe the United States occupies too prominent and necessary a position in the world sphere to permanently remain aloof from world problems. The influence and counsel of this Nation should be and would be of help to other countries. Even a minor war has its disastrous repercussions and for civilization's sake war should be abolished. Naturally the most effective method for the abolition of war lies in concerted action by all nations.

But it seems that the world is not ripe for a union of nations to solve disputes amicably. War threats in Europe, and Asia for that matter, cannot be minimized. The American people do not want war. Therefore, we have no recourse but the selfish protection of neutrality. If we cannot help stop world war, at least we can save ourselves, thus avoiding war, avoiding the devastating after effects we will be in a better position when the world has settled down again to lead the way to world peace.

Since selfish protection is the only thing left for us today, we must go all the way. No loophole must remain through which the American people may be dragged into a foreign war not of their making and not of their will.

I expected a more adequate bill than has been offered by the House Foreign Affairs Committee. When I addressed that body during the hearings I was interrupted by the chairman of the committee, and he told me that he even favored the prohibition of the collection of funds in America for any belligerent. I complimented him then—as I do now. I believed that in going to that extreme he was demonstrating to the limit a desire for neutrality such as is approved by every man and every woman in America who wants this country kept out of war. I assumed from his stand on that point that the Committee on Foreign Affairs would report out a real neutrality bill. That they have not done so must be apparent to every Member of this Congress. It must be apparent to those who urge the adoption of the McReynolds bill. I have yet to hear anyone in support of this measure assert it is really a neutrality bill. A part-way measure it is, but nothing more.

Now, if the gentleman from Tennessee uses section 5 of his bill as evidence of his sincerity for real neutrality, he must at the same time explain to the country why he takes a reverse position in section 4. We have presented to us in this McReynolds bill a confusion of purposes instead of a measure definitely intended to keep us out of the next world war. In section 5 the gentleman from Tennessee says very distinctly that he is afraid of our being involved in war if funds are collected for belligerents. No funds, he decrees for mothers, children, for old men and women suffering for the want of medicine and food. So vociferously does he claim to want neutrality that he would even stop such contributions in order to keep us out of war.

But, first, in section 4, he makes it very plain that he would permit business with belligerent nations. He would give the opportunity for profits to those who could make money out of war. He apparently closes his eyes to the stronger probability of our precipitation into war through the trade he is willing to permit. He ignores the fact that his bill leads the way to a repetition of the circumstances which precipitated our entrance into the World War in 1917. Unwilling or unable to profit by the terrible lesson of the last war, he now offers to this Congress and to the American people, in his influential position as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, a measure it would be much better not to adopt at all.

No one who believes that the protection of this Nation's peace today lies in neutrality can accept the measure presented to us by the House Foreign Affairs Committee as a neutrality measure. It should be given another title.

Of course, if one is merely giving lip service to neutrality, if one is honestly not concerned about keeping America safe from the next war, a bill such as Mr. McREYNOLDS advocates would be satisfactory. But the people of America want neutrality. The Democratic platform of 1936 promised neutrality with this unequivocal statement, and I quote:

> We shall continue to observe a true neutrality in the disputes of others; * * * to guard against being drawn by political commitments, international banking, or private trade, into any war which may develop anywhere.

We Members of this Congress, as representatives of the people of America, must not and dare not enact into law as a neutrality measure this bill which has been offered to us.

In discussion of section 4 of this bill Mr. McREYNOLDS said, and I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 2156 and 2157:

> Should Great Britain become involved in a war in any part of the world and Canada assume the technical status of a belligerent, * * * the tens of thousands of American citizens who own cottages or camps in Canada would have to spend their summers at home.

This from the mighty champion of neutrality! Such thought, offered as argument against the passage of a real neutrality bill, beggars the arguments of weight and character that have been made in this debate as expression of sincere belief either for or against neutrality.

I look forward to the time when historians shall have recorded the great debates on this the most important issue before the people of America today. I see emblazoned on the pages of history for school children to commit to memory the fact that neutrality legislation was defeated on the argument that tens of thousands of American citizens may not enjoy their vacations in beautiful Canada, but may be compelled during the summer seasons to enjoy the resorts in the United States.

I heard also an oratorical gem falling from the lips of the gentleman from Ohio. He, too, described an intolerable situation which might be brought about if we passed a real neutrality law. Let me quote the gentleman:

> How far have we traveled with this theory of neutrality when we allow ourselves to be so prejudiced, to jail a boy for transporting a velocipede, or a little girl for transporting her doll baby, across the border if he or she has not first transferred title to some foreign government?

Afraid that little children may not be able to send their velocipedes and dolls to the summer camps in Canada that the gentleman from Tennessee told us about, our colleague from Ohio believes it would be better that the theory and the practice of neutrality be abandoned. The gentleman from Ohio advocates prohibiting American citizens from traveling on belligerent vessels, but, in the same breath, he is opposed to the prohibition that American vessels be kept from the war zones, or that American goods be prohibited from the war zones. Let me quote from the friend of his childhood and mine, too, William Shakespeare—O Consistency, thou art indeed a jewel! [Laughter and applause.]

During the course of the debate last Friday those of us who advocate neutrality were accused of basing our opinions as to the kind of neutrality law that ought to be enacted upon what happened during the World War. Our accusers suggested that we ought to base a neutrality law upon what the future may bring to pass. If that is not begging the question, at least it is splitting the finest of hairs, and only in an effort to defeat real neutrality legislation.

Every Member of Congress knows, or can acquaint himself, with the history of the World War. On that knowledge we can base a law which will protect us in the future. I can conceive of nothing which will give us any sounder basis for legislation. None of us are soothsayers, crystal gazers, or fortune tellers. We can assume from what has taken place in the past what may happen in the future. If our experience in the past cannot guide us in writing legislation which will keep us out of war in the future, I do not know what can.

I recognize the strength of the arguments which favor granting to a President of the United States the discretionary power to decide for this Nation the many, many issues that will arise in connection with the prohibitions contained in a neutrality law. That theory, and the arguments in support of it, listen well. To those unacquainted with the full story, or to those who do not stop to think, Presidential discretion as to the application of these prohibitions seems all that is necessary. Pass the buck to the President and he will settle every difficult question sounds easy, but, ladies and gentlemen of this Committee, let us stop for a moment and think.

Suppose a war breaks out and it becomes necessary for America, for its own protection, to declare that a state of war exists. Automatically we shut off ammunition, loans to the belligerents, and prohibit American citizens from traveling to belligerent nations. But what about the hundreds of other situations that immediately confront us? War has been declared. No matter what the President of the United States may decide, his decision must, of necessity, injure or help one side or the other.

We had an example of that during the Italian-Ethiopian War. Because war was going on, we were powerless to pass legislation; our President did not dare issue a single order under the laws of this country. Both sides were crying out against the United States doing a single thing, unless we wished to be accused of taking sides.

Do you not see, my friends, that all of these promises offered upon the floor of this House as to what the President may or may not be empowered to do under the McReynolds bill mean absolutely nothing, for once war has started we would not dare to do anything further than what the law calls for for fear of arousing one side or the other against us. If by chance the President did exercise the discretion empowered to him under provisions such as are contained in the McReynolds bill, and took steps not definitely provided in the law after a war breaks out, we would be accused of taking sides, and, just as surely as night follows day, America would find herself engaged in another war.

On the other hand, if today we write the law definitely, and war comes tomorrow, no belligerent can accuse us of favoring either side in the conflict. Let us be sensible. Let us stop relying on the hope that a President will do the right thing, even if that is possible—and I contend it is not—by a senseless law giving so-called—and it is only so-called—discretionary power.

The gentleman from Ohio took exception to a statement I made that in the event a real neutrality bill was passed it would be unnecessary for this Government to spend vast sums of money upon a navy. In fact, he goes so far as to say that we would need a larger navy. On what grounds does he make this claim? The other nations of the world, he says, would have to build larger navies to protect the goods they purchase from America, and therefore America would need a larger navy, he says, to protect our merchantmen in their attempt to make purchases in the Far East. If that reasoning must compel us to enact the McReynolds bill, then, I ask, by the same theory and argument, will any navy be large enough to protect America under the McReynolds bill, which permits American vessels in belligerent and war zones? The seven and a half billion dollars the British Government is going to spend in the next 5 years would be a candle compared to what the Navy we will need is going to cost. The naval appropriation measure passed a few days ago by this Congress will be woefully inadequate. And last, but not least, let me quote this statement from the arguments offered to advance the McReynolds bill. The gentleman from Ohio said:

> We are the last remaining bulwark of western civilization. If we permit ourselves to become engulfed in another world catastrophe and our manhood to be bled white, then it can mean but one thing—the abdication of the supremacy of the white race and the ascendancy of the yellow race.

It sounds like the goblin stories used to frighten children, this meaningless argument for a large and unnecessary Navy, advanced to defeat real neutrality. Again we are confronted with the threat of invasion by Japan. While we are talking about the yellow peril, let me tell you something that will make your blood run cold. I heard it most seriously the other day.

A mighty earthquake is to come upon California. There will be a resultant tidal wave which will sweep over that great State. While the people of California are struggling with the earthquake and the tidal wave, Japan will rush in, overcome not only California but sweep through the rest of the United States and take possession of America. Tokyo will become the capital of the United States.

The tragedy, so far as international good will is concerned, is that these tirades in this country against the so-called yellow peril have evoked from Japan like warnings that America is preparing to wipe out the Japanese nation and annex those unfortunate islands to California. Are we expected to take this kind of talk seriously and permit it to defeat our effort to enact neutrality legislation which will keep us out of another war?

On last Friday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] called our attention, and particularly Mr. MCREYNOLDS' attention, to the Democratic platform of 1936 on the subject of neutrality. In that platform we definitely promised the people of America that private trade shall not be allowed to involve America in war. The gentleman from Indiana well said that neither the Pittman nor the McReynolds bill protect America from becoming involved in a war through private trade.

The McReynolds bill contains many excellent provisions, but it does not protect the American people against two very obvious war dangers. I want to call to your attention the fact that the McReynolds bill does not provide for an absolute cash-and-carry policy of trade. Neither does the McReynolds bill protect the American people against the danger of a wartime boom in American industry. In a few words, the bill in its present form permits American shipping to enter war zones carrying cargoes destined for belligerent nations. The bill also allows goods to be shipped to belligerents without requiring that title in those goods be transferred from American ownership to foreign governments or their nationals.

You have heard that the bill does offer protection against these two dangers. But let me point out that this protection is dependent upon the action of one man or, in actual practice, one Government department. The President may invoke these two restrictions on American commerce if he finds them necessary. If he does so, it will be on the advice of the Department of State. Thus the responsibility is placed almost entirely on the shoulders of one department. If he does not invoke these two provisions, wartime trade by Americans in American ships can be carried on with the consequent danger of our becoming involved in a war over this trade.

This responsibility being placed upon the executive branch of the Government is a tremendous one. Contained within this responsibility is the power to set us on the road to war.

When we look back at our experiences during the period before we went into the World War we find that similar responsibility was placed upon the shoulders of the Executive at that time. No one man, however capable, however sincere in wanting peace, can be protected under a law such as Mr. MCREYNOLDS proposes, against the tremendous pressure which would result from the desire of individuals who would choose profits rather than peace. We must not place this tremendous burden upon our Chief Executive. He should not be faced constantly in wartime with the problem of deciding each individual case as it comes up. And that is what he would be forced to do under the provisions of the McReynolds bill.

He should be protected against this danger by having the law say unequivocally that—

First, no American ship may carry any goods whatsoever to or for use of belligerents. Second, no goods shall leave this country until all American right, title, and interest has been transferred to the foreign government or individual to whom it is destined.

Without these two points being made mandatory and automatic, so that they will go into operation whenever war breaks out, the American people will be pushed into war through American commerce and trade which might not be barred under the provisions of the McReynolds bill.

A few days ago we read in the newspapers about a Spanish ship being sunk or captured by the rebel forces. This ship was the same vessel which occupied our attention in the opening hours of Congress. The ship was carrying a large quantity of munitions for the use of one of the belligerents in the Spanish conflict. When I read in the papers that the vessel had been shelled and captured with a number of the crew killed or wounded, I thought how lucky we are that this vessel was not an American vessel carrying commodities destined for one of the two forces fighting in Spain. I also thought how dangerous it would be to allow any American ship to carry a cargo destined for a belligerent or to sail into a war zone.

Under the terms of the McReynolds bill this incident might have been paralleled by an American vessel carrying canned goods or machinery to one of the belligerents. Such a vessel runs the obvious risk of being stopped by one of the belligerents. It might be captured or it might be sunk. Lives might be lost. We can well imagine the tremendous hue and cry there would be over the entire land if such an event took place. Such a disturbance would bring a duplication of the events which preceded our entrance into the World War. In fact, it was happenings like these which finally caused us to go into that war. We have the historical facts; we have this most recent example of what takes place in wartime to tell us that there should be a definite, clear-cut policy for keeping all American vessels from trade, direct or indirect, with nations at war.

I am also reminded by the Spanish incident of the fact that a vessel, whether it be American or foreign, sailing under the program contained in the McReynolds bill, could carry a cargo of material in which an American company or an American national retained a financial interest. Can you imagine the outcry if a ship carrying such a cargo, in which there was a large economic interest held by one of our nationals, was sunk or captured?

Immediately the Government of this country would be subject to tremendous pressure to protect our trade with belligerent nations. If we protested against such infringement against our trade we would get nowhere. Our participation in the World War resulted from such incidents. Nations faced with the problem of winning a war take every possible step to cripple their opponents and to insure success to their war effort. Therefore, based upon our experience in the World War, diplomatic protests would be meaningless. We would then be forced to use our Navy to protect our trade. If we protect this trade by the use of American naval forces we will be taking the first great step to war. To avoid becoming involved in that war there is only one answer. That answer lies in the condition that no goods shall leave this country until all American interest has been given up.

There is a further problem which the McReynolds bill does not attempt to regulate in any fundamental fashion. That is the problem of curbing a domestic industrial boom in this country in wartime. If we permit goods to be sold to nations at war we are going to create a tremendous and profitable trade for those industries which are allowed to sell their products abroad. While the McReynolds bill contains a drastic provision against extending any loans or any credit to a nation at war, it is important to remember that foreign investments in this country have reached tremendous proportions. Over $7,000,000,000 of foreign funds are now invested in this country. Money can be quickly realized upon these foreign holdings in American securities. A serious danger would result if this $7,000,000,000 was used to purchase American goods. And, make no mistake, it will be used to purchase American goods.

Certain industries whose goods would be in demand would increase production and employ more labor. The business would be profitable. Handsome returns would accrue to those who control the industries involved.

But what would happen when the money available was exhausted? The foreign orders for the goods would cease. Production on an abnormally large scale would cease. Employment would drop. There would be then a tremendous drive from those who were making profits and from those who had been employed for the resumption of this trade. An unnatural, a tragic, boom had been started and Americans benefiting from it would demand its continuance. If such trade were continued we would be right back where we were in 1917.

These are some of the dangers inherent in the McReynolds bill. Under these circumstances I think it is appropriate and necessary for this House to consider amending the bill to provide for an outright embargo on the export of any goods to belligerents the sale of which is liable to endanger the peace and neutrality of the United States.

I intend to offer amendments to cover the three dangers in the McReynolds bill to which I have called your attention. I urge each and every one of you not to be misled by the fact that this measure is labeled a neutrality bill or a bill with a cash-and-carry policy.

I urge you to read carefully those sections of the bill which deal with the cash-and-carry program. I urge you also to read through the bill and to note that it contains no protection against a war boom.

I summarize the three dangers I see contained in the McReynolds bill, that—

First. American ships can go into war zones;

Second. Commodities can be shipped to belligerents with Americans retaining interest or title in such goods;

Third. The bill holds no protection against a wartime industrial boom.

These three points are most important phases of the neutrality problem. Unless we are protected at these three points by writing into this legislation automatic restrictions applying in all cases, the American people will not be protected against war.

No one neutrality bill will, by itself, keep us out of war if the American people want to take sides and enter into a war. Let us not be deceived on that point. But I respectfully submit to you ladies and gentlemen of the Committee the fact that this is no excuse for not writing the strongest and the most adequate bill that can be drafted.

I will offer amendments on these three points and I urge your support of them. Such support will be indicative of your desire to keep this country from being drawn into a foreign war by political commitments, by international banking, by private trading. The Democratic platform of 1936 specifically calls for a neutrality law to protect the American people against these dangers. Without the amendments suggested, however, the American people, under the terms of the McReynolds bill, will not receive this protection. As a party we are committed to this principle of neutrality. We must carry it out in actual practice. [Applause.]

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the principal question involved in the pending neutrality legislation is whether embargoes on commodities shall be mandatory or discretionary. The Senate bill makes the commodity embargo mandatory, while the House bill vests discretion in the President to prescribe limitations and exceptions.

The method of achieving neutrality as presented in both of these bills is novel. It has been pointed out that there is no such neutrality legislation outside of this country as that contained in the existing law passed by the Seventy-fourth Congress; and the proposed additions contained in this bill far exceed in complexity and unpredictable consequences the inhibitions of the existing law. It is purely speculative what either the Senate or House bills will produce. The subject of neutrality is peculiarly prolific of theoretics.

In the absence of time to make that thorough study available to members of the committee considering this legislation, a Member is reduced to such common-sense conclusions as he may be able to formulate from his general knowledge. I only have time to state two or three of these conclusions.

A mandatory embargo will bring the battle front to the 3-mile American boundary line. Blockades of American ports, principally by submarines, will be established. They will be like shoals of sharks. The trade will go to the sea power able to maintain an effective blockade of these ports. Japan is the only power which could maintain such a blockade of our Pacific ports. England and France, if allies, would control in the Atlantic. While Japanese control of the Pacific might be unquestioned, five European nations have growing submarine fleets, and the result might be the naval war of the century on the 3-mile line. If this would not involve this country in war, what would?

A general discretionary embargo once put into effect would produce the same result. My surmise is that it would not be put into effect on any such sweeping scale as a mandatory embargo.

Our experience with the neutrality legislation of the Seventy-fourth Congress ought to show us that we cannot put a bill of particulars in a neutrality act and have it fit the next emergency. We have had to amend that act in this Congress to include civil wars as well as international wars. The next emergency would present other unforeseen developments disclosing a failure of the law to fit the case.

In the debate there has been pointed out a number of constitutional ways in which the President of the United States without consulting Congress could involve this country in a foreign war, thus indicating the enormous discretionary powers already vested in the Executive. Even under these bills he has the discretion to determine whether any commodities embargo shall be laid.

These conclusions impel me to the discretionary method in the matter of embargoes against commodities, raw materials, agricultural products, manufactures which are not primary war materials as the more workable of two doubtful courses.

It is said we are presented with a choice between neutrality and trade. Academically considered, it sounds good. But when the emergency comes and we are confronted with abandonment of the freedom of the seas and of the use of the seas and of foreign trade, there is a question in my mind whether the national reaction will be what the proponents of extreme neutrality legislation hope it will be.

I feel that we made a great advance in the existing legislation to embargo arms, implements, and munitions of war, to withhold loans and credits to belligerent nations, and to keep Americans off belligerent vessels. I want to point out, though, that neither of these involved us in the World War. The final occasion of that war was the murder of American citizens on American vessels carrying no contraband of war, and destroyed not only in violation of all international law but in violation of every law of God and man and every rule of civilized conduct. So neither of these bills establish any safety zone.

Which brings me back to an observation I made the last time I discussed the national defense in the House—that neutrality is a good thing if you are able to defend it. I have been glad to note that this administration is getting able to defend it, and all measures to that end have had my unqualified support. I abhor war; I am as strongly for neutrality as any Member of this House, but I cannot subscribe to the philosophy that to keep out of war and insure neutrality we have only to scrap our agencies of defense and put our faith in and entrust our national safety to neutrality acts and peace treaties. All existing peace treaties—the Kellogg Pact, the Nine Power Pact—are already only scraps of paper. They need not await the emergency of war. They have already been repudiated and violated by the very signatory nations; and that is what, in my opinion, under the stress of the emergency, will happen to this legislation. Discretionary legislation may be preparing the noose. Mandatory legislation is already putting our necks in it. Under mandatory legislation we are playing our cards before the game starts. Under the discretionary plan the other fellow must play his cards first. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, if we want to establish neutrality we should prohibit all intercourse of every nature with all belligerents if we are to adopt the embargo method. We should not have half-way measures. We seem to be proceeding upon the theory that war is a duel between armies. War is an economic struggle between peoples. War is no longer made merely against combatants. The objective of war today is against the noncombatants, against industrial centers, and against the population in general. No war can be carried on unless the people themselves support it, and is, therefore, essentially a struggle of peoples. We either ought to have that kind of law that would abolish all trade, or we should have open free relationships and depend upon our time-honored principle of freedom of the seas, with adequate forces to protect our freedom.

I do not believe our entrance into the World War was caused by our trade with one side or the other or through our loans. They may have been a factor, but the World War involved the United States because the other powers of the world were convinced that we could not and would not fight. The thing that inflamed the American people to the point of permitting propaganda to induce them to go into war was acts of depredation, it is true, but what was behind those acts was the feeling of European powers that with impunity they could sink our ships or do anything else, for we were too proud to fight. All their agents in this country convinced their people back home that we could not fight. We seem to forget that the first two American ships that were sunk were sunk by the British and not by the Germans, and we came close to going to war with England, but we did nothing about it but write notes.

After that the Germans took the tip from Great Britain and went further and further in their invasion of our rights until finally they forced us into war. This bill, let there be no mistake, is nothing but creating a partnership with the aggressor nations. The aggressive, militaristic nations are going to acquire supplies that they need long in advance, and they will have the credits they need established before they commence hostilities. They are not going to need what we have, but the peace-loving and quiet, nonmilitaristic nations, non-munitions-producing countries, are the ones who are going to need our help. If our policy is established now and becomes general, it means that a few aggressive, militaristic powers can and probably will gobble up the rest of the world. [Applause.] The passage of this act will usher in the greatest period of aggressive warfare and of world conquest that history has ever seen. We are saying to the weak nations, "We wash our hands of you; we won't help you."

If one nation wants to invade another nation, we establish the principle that says, "No; you can get no help from us."

Aggressor nations know that is going to be so, and with impunity they will start on a rampage of invasion and conquest. Where would we be if that policy had been in effect during the last 150 or 200 years? We were a little weak Nation struggling for existence and without the help of friendly powers, we never would have come into being at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A brief glance at that picture there of Lafayette will demonstrate the truth of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MAAS. Yes; it is a most graphic illustration. There is another side to this picture. We are far more likely to be drawn into war under this policy than under existing conditions. A powerful nation, in order to shut off its enemies, is not going to establish a blockade of our ports against our own shipping if we are a neutral, it is true, but it is going to blockade the ports from which its enemies obtain their supplies.

It will be easier to shut the enemy off from essential supplies by blockading the ports from which these supplies are shipped, rather than by blockading the enemies' ports in an effort to keep the supplies from being delivered. The imports will simply be tied up in their own ports. This is cheaper and safer. The mere fact that such a country whose ports may be blockaded may be a neutral will mean nothing, for under the leadership of our great neutrality policy no one will aid such a neutral. So the nation in a position to enforce such blockades against neutrals will do so without interference.

Unfortunately, it is very likely that we, too, will need to import materials from some of these same ports for our normal peacetime industrial life.

There are a number of absolutely essential products that we are forced to import, and without which industry in this country will collapse.

If the source of these products was closed to us the effect would begin to be felt within 2 weeks. With continued choking off of our imports there would soon be many more millions of American workers thrown out of jobs. In a few months of this the depths of the depression would seem like the 1929 boom, compared to the bottoms to which we would drop.

The auto industry would close, construction would soon be at a standstill, mines would shut down, and the whole industrial and commercial structure would soon fail in the United States. Our national defense would disappear as an effective force.

Either that or we would be forced to run through such blockades to obtain the essential products not produced here but absolutely needed in this country. This would mean war. This is the inevitable outlook for our future if we adopt this bill as our international policy.

On the other hand, if we maintain our traditional policy of freedom of the seas, and are prepared, and able to protect that freedom, no nation will dare to blockade the ports of any neutral nation with whom we are trading.

Once such a blockade is established though, to break it is to become involved in a war.

If we voluntarily surrender our rights we will soon lose those rights. If nations engaged in war believe that we will not defend our rights they will soon take advantage of the situation if it helps them to do so.

I am not defending the right to make a profit out of war trade. This is only incidental anyway. The rights I am talking about are those of importing essential products, and the exportation of our surplus products.

Whether they go to neutrals or belligerents is really not material. That question is sentimental and not fundamental.

Our object is to avoid needless wars. I take it that no one—certainly no one who is worthy of calling himself an American—is opposed to a war of defense against an invader. Yet, what is the difference between starvation of our people as a result of the collapse of industry and agriculture which would follow pulling our ships off the seas because of foreign wars, or of our people being starved as a result of an invader conquering us. People will be just as hungry, and suffer just as much by an impoverished standard of living regardless of the cause.

We have a right to protect our standard of living. I speak of no abstract right, but of the very right of our people to live.

If we pass this so-called neutrality bill we had better immediately double our Army and our Navy.

I assure you it will be far harder and more costly to enforce this kind of neutrality than to protect our freedom of the seas.

Our great need is to mind our own business and make other nations mind their's so far as we are concerned. To be able to do this, we should remain friendly with all, but let the world know that we are amply able and willing to protect our freedom.

As a weak nation we are in the gravest danger from every war that breaks out anywhere. As a strong nation, prepared and able to mind its own business, we are assured of the greatest chance of remaining at peace.

The surest guarantee against war for us is the strength to enforce peace.

We are a rich nation in natural resources; we constitute a great market, and we are the only civilized nation in an equitable climate that has abundant room to spare. The rest of the world needs what we have—resources, markets, and territory to take care of overflowing populations.

If overpressed peoples can get from us what they need cheaper by taking it than by purchasing it from us, they will endeavor to take it; that is all there is to it.

China wanted peace. It did not want war, so it made no preparations against war. But all of China's love of peace and aversion of war has not saved China from the ravages of war. We, too, want peace. But to avoid war we must be adequately prepared against war.

We are certainly laying the foundation for a most dangerous situation for ourselves in the future by such an international policy as we are proposing to establish.

If we now refuse to sell munitions of defense to peoples threatened by invasion, the inevitable result will be a refusal to sell us essential products for our defense if we are threatened. We are potentially powerful and strong, but actually very weak, in fact, unable to defend ourselves against invasion without substantial importations of certain products not available in this country. Shut off from such supplies even the mighty United States could be humbled by an invader.

Government manufacture of munitions is no solution for even the Government cannot manufacture munitions without manganese, for instance.

Depending on neutrality based on embargoes will avail us little in our desire for peace. It behooves us to keep our powder dry.

The House bill certainly seeks to establish an entirely new principle and radical change in our system of balances and checks, and upsets the previous distribution of certain fundamental powers heretofore reserved exclusively to specified branches of the Government. The power to declare war was vested in the Congress by the framers of the Constitution for some very good reason.

A basic difference between the office of a constitutional President and a ruler of whatever kind of title is the right to make war. While it is true that the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, he is such only under the Constitution. The Army and Navy are not his personal forces, and take no oath of allegiance to him, but both they and the President take a common oath to a common constitution.

Yet, the power to commit an act of war is the power to make war, and this bill gives to the President the discretionary powers to discriminate in embargoes. Such discrimination is interpreted as an act of war, and war will certainly follow laying an embargo upon one belligerent as against another.

Surely this is no power to delegate without a mandate from the people expressed through a constitutional amendment.

To confer such extraordinary powers upon the President makes of him a potential ruler.

The American boys who are killed in a war started by the President's embargo policy, will be just as dead as in a war duly declared by Congress.

There is still another angle to this far-reaching departure of traditional American policy that will create new problems, much more fraught with war danger than maintaining freedom of the seas.

If we are to permit no shipping on American ships to belligerents and voluntarily waive all of our rights upon the high seas, those in need of our products will have to send their own ships to our ports to get their supplies.

This will inevitably lead opposing belligerents to establish a blockade immediately beyond the 3-mile limit of every American port, in an effort to prevent supplies reaching their enemies.

Such a blockade is bound to cause complications for our own normal peacetime trade to neutrals, even if such trade is confined to the Western Hemisphere. Our commerce to South America would undoubtedly be interfered with and perhaps blocked entirely. Even though we swallow our pride, sacrifice our trade, and surrender our markets, it will not save us. South American countries, shut off from the United States as a source of supply, must turn across the seas, with consequent involvement in hostile blockades. As a reprisal it is natural that such overseas powers will carry the war to South American republics, possibly establishing European or Asiatic control in South America. This would ultimately involve us, whether we wanted to be involved or not.

Is it conceivable that a successful militaristic power or group of powers, having conquered and subdued the rest of the world, as will certainly happen if they are not checked in the meantime, would stop short of the United States with all of its wealth and comparatively sparsely occupied territory?

Of course not. Yet if the great bulk of nonmilitaristic countries cannot buy the essentials to resist an invader they will certainly be ravaged. The only alternative for such countries is to go into such a staggering program of arms and munitions producing and storage as to bankrupt normal industry and commerce.

Billions of dollars will have to be diverted from usual trade channels and put into nonrevenue producing arms manufacture; every liberty-loving people, desirous of maintaining independence will have to turn their countries into veritable storehouses of munitions, if they cannot obtain them when in danger, even to defend themselves against invasion.

Then indeed the world will become a powder keg. Commerce and trade will be so robbed of money, diverted to munitions production and storage, as to paralyze business. Unemployment will become so general throughout the world as to destroy governments. Revolutions and wars would certainly follow until civilization itself would be wiped out.

No, the embargo method of neutrality is not the answer to the problem of keeping the United States out of war.

It is a remedy that produces a condition far more fatal than the ill it seeks to cure.

Our best hope of peace is to mind our own business, keep out of other nations' quarrels, let the world know that we covet nothing anywhere else in the world but friendship and that we can and will defend our reasonable freedom anywhere, any time, against anyone who attempts to interfere with it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

NEUTRALITY AND WAR DEBTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and colleagues of the House, there is little that could be added to this discussion on the pending neutrality legislation. This and a similar bill have been discussed for several weeks in both Houses of Congress, and no doubt all Members of the House have made up their minds how they will vote. Therefore, my remarks will be rather brief.

A year ago this week, when neutrality legislation was being considered before this body to extend the temporary Embargo Act another year, I spoke in favor of this legislation then and urged its enactment, not as a perfect bill, not as ideal legislation, but freely admitted it was only a makeshift measure. I said then that it was a great step in the right direction. At that time I also expressed the hope that permanent legislation with real teeth in it would be carefully prepared during this session and enacted into law.

STEP TOWARD WORLD PEACE

Mr. Chairman, I am not laboring under the delusion that the pending neutrality bill will outlaw future wars. I do not share the illusion of some of the gentlemen supporting this legislation that with this bill written on the statute books it will be impossible for our children or our children's children to view the ghastly scenes of mechanized military murder. But, as I pointed out a year ago, this legislation is certainly a progressive and forward step toward world peace. [Applause.]

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I do not share the views of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] or the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON], both of whom have bitterly criticized the pending neutrality legislation as an empty gesture, and yet who admitted that they will vote for it on final roll call.

It will be recalled that when the neutrality bill was pending before this House a year ago several Members stood on the floor of the House and denounced it as an empty gesture, as a foolish waste of time, and some Members even went so far as to say it was worse than nothing at all. Yet some of those who denounced the measure voted for it, and others who bitterly opposed and actually voted against it are conspicuous by their absence here today.

EASY TO RAISE OBJECTIONS

Mr. Chairman, I have listened to other critics and opponents of this legislation with considerable interest. It is so easy to raise objections. Take, for instance, the argument of my good friend from Minnesota, the gentleman who just preceded me. If we follow the suggestions of the gentleman from Minnesota we would, in my judgment, not only jeopardize the peace of the world but would kindle the fires of strife and possible warfare within our gates.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman please explain that? I do not quite understand him.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. If America should go so far as to place an absolute embargo on all commerce, including farm commodities and foodstuffs, and say, absolutely, "You cannot trade with any nation on the face of the earth", it is not difficult to imagine what might occur under such circumstances within our own borders.

Mr. MAAS. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman. I made the suggestion merely to show the ultimate ridiculousness of the present proposal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Well, I am delighted that the gentleman has made his position a little clearer.

IMPORTANCE OF NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

The fact is, this is the most important legislation affecting the peace and prosperity of this generation, as well as future posterity, that has or will come before the Seventy-fifth Congress.

Our people have become antiwar conscious. Certainly there is hardly a limit to the distance that our American people would willingly go and no sacrifice they would not cheerfully endure, if by so doing they could have any reasonable guaranty of outlawing future wars. Many of us have not forgotten the ghastly scenes of the World War, with all of its deprivations and horrifying experiences. Our people have not so soon forgotten the terrifying and heartbreaking days of the World War, which conflict, you will recall, was to be the one war that was certain to end all wars and "make the world safe for democracy."

TRAGIC EVIDENCES OF WAR

Nor have our people forgotten the many lives that were sacrificed upon the fields of battle and from disease and exposure incident to that tragic period when the black clouds of war hung so heavily over this land.

Tragic evidences of that war are still all about us. For many of our men—once referred to so often as the "flower of American manhood"—the World War has not ended. To them it is now, and will continue to be, one long, horrible nightmare.

Our people have not forgotten the fact that 3,000 millionaires were made by the misfortunes of war. Munitions makers plied their damnable trade in a reckless and shameful fashion and sold their armaments of war to both sides in that world conflict long before America was drawn into it.

Many American citizens who then thought of war as a lark went cavorting over the seas and in war zones souvenir hunting although they had been warned repeatedly to stay off belligerent ships. International bankers and bloated bondholders had floated loans all over Europe that helped promote and prolong the World War, and there was no law to prevent Americans from going on such a spree. Too many Americans were grasping for gold and for profits at the cost of human suffering.

PLUGS THREE HOLES AGAINST WAR

The pending bill plugs at least three holes, any one of which might drag this Nation into another ghastly and expensive war:

First, it contains a mandatory provision making an automatic embargo upon the sale of munitions to belligerent nations.

Second, it contains a mandatory prohibition against extending loans and credits to such warring nations.

Third, it makes it illegal for American citizens to travel on the high seas on belligerent vessels and also makes a mandatory prohibition against same except at their own risk.

So it is absurd to say that the pending legislation is an empty gesture or to intimate that it is worse than nothing at all.

With these cardinal principles as a background, as a bulwark on which we have constructed this important legislation, a war-mad world will be given to understand that America does not propose to be inveigled into another war beyond the sea, but will heed the advice of George Washington, who gave mighty sound advice when he urged America to stay out of entangling alliances in the Old World. [Applause.]

ABOUT WAR DEBTS

There is one subject that is closely alined to neutrality that has hardly been touched upon in this debate. It is a subject, however, that this Congress must face sooner or later. I refer to European war debts. Announcement was made this week by the Exchequer of the British Treasury that Great Britain is starting on a $10,000,000,000 army and navy construction program. We are told that more than $7,000,000,000 of that program has already been authorized by the British Government. In support of that program the British Exchequer boasts that British finances were never in better shape. Yet Great Britain has steadfastly refused to pay any part of the principal or interest on more than $5,000,000,000 of war debts that she owes America. This was borrowed when Great Britain had her back to the wall and begging America to save her very existence.

Both France and Italy have announced unprecedented peacetime military programs. Yet the French Government owes the American people more than $4,000,000,000 war debts that she does not pretend to make any effort to pay. In addition to that, France, you remember, bought $2,000,000,000 worth of American goods and commodities at the close of the World War and struck a bargain at 10 cents on the dollar, all of which was to be paid in 1 year's time. France not only refuses to pay that obligation but she scoffs at our peace talk as well as any suggestion that France pay her just debts to the American Government as she goes on pell-mell preparing for another war. This in the face of the fact that big-hearted Uncle Sam has already canceled 51 percent of the French war loan upon the assurance by that unappreciative Government that she would pay her debts to America promptly in the future.

"POVERTY STRICKEN" EUROPE IN MAD MILITARY RACE

There is also "poor little poverty-stricken Italy" that several years ago induced this Government to cancel 74 percent of her war loan on the solemn promise to pay thereafter promptly and in full. Yet a few months ago we saw the sorry spectacle of the Italian Government sending their hordes of well-trained soldiers down into helpless Ethopia without provocation for the avowed purpose of expanding Italy's territory and extending her Mediterranean domination. Now Italian troops are pounding at the gates of the war-devastated Spanish capital in a mad and murderous determination to spread Italian power and domination in Spanish territory. Since America foolishly canceled 74 percent of her war loan Italy has quadrupled the size of her standing army, yet she is so poverty stricken that she cannot pay even her scaled-down and long-past-due debts to America. These debts, if unpaid, will, of course, be saddled on the backs of our children as well as unborn generations.

This Government, however, in the face of these facts, has offered no protest to the British, Italian, or French Governments with reference to the mad military race now going on in Europe. But there are some among us, in and out of Congress, who are laboring under the hallucination that we can guarantee unto ourselves peace and prosperity by entering into a competition of army and navy building with the war-mad world.

NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION MILESTONE TOWARD WORLD PEACE

We cannot compete with the jingoists of the Old World in the preparation for wars. Already, I fear, we have gone too far in that direction. The construction of $50,000,000 to $60,000,000 battleships voted by this House a few days ago will not guarantee world peace. But we can and must enact neutrality legislation and lay down a yardstick for ourselves in dealing with nations across the sea. Although this legislation does not go as far as I had hoped it would go, it is built upon sound, just, and unselfish principles and is a milestone toward which America and peace-loving Americans are now endeavoring to travel toward the goal of world-wide peace. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEITER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, in considering the neutrality bill now before the Congress it seems to me that if anything, it does not go far enough in achieving real neutrality, which is the concern of every American citizen. This matter has never been more important than it is today and popular opinion demands a strong neutrality policy which will afford every protection against our country being involved in a foreign war.

Neutrality legislation is a declaration of policy toward nations engaged in war and is the only means which will prevent our being drawn into the next war when it comes. There is more danger at the present time of another European war than there was at any time prior to 1914. This danger makes necessary the enactment of a strong neutrality act which will prevent the United States from being forced into war. The Congress is charged with the responsibility of formulating a neutrality policy to replace existing temporary legislation, and I am heartily in favor of the strongest neutrality bill which may be devised.

If this new law is to offer protection against dangerous entanglement in future wars, it must provide for an embargo against munitions as well as other war materials to belligerent nations. No loans or credits shall be permitted to countries involved in war and these embargoes shall be enforced against both sides in the conflict. In order to achieve true neutrality American citizens will not have the protection of this Government when traveling in war territory and no citizen of this country will be permitted to retain an interest in any shipments made to warring nations after they leave the ports of the United States. This neutrality shall be applicable to civil as well as international strife, as civil war at the present time carries an ever-increasing threat of international or world war.

I heartily endorse all suggestions for a mandatory neutrality policy which will definitely show that the United States is opposed to war. When this country can no longer be used as a source of war supplies warring nations will be forced to find some other method of adjusting conflicts rather than wars which depend to a large extent on munitions and other war materials manufactured in the United States.

It is urgent that neutrality legislation be enacted without delay before war which threatens actually comes. It is a difficult matter to write a neutrality policy after war has come without appearing to favor one side or the other in that war. When war comes it is going to be increasingly difficult to remain out of that war unless we are protected by a strong neutrality law, as the temptation to prosper by that war may in time tend to destroy our neutrality and lead us into war. Any neutrality policy which may be strong enough to keep this country out of war will result in the loss of a cash gain and deny to all of us participation in that prosperity which comes out of economic participation in foreign wars. However, from our experience in the last war we all know that we cannot share economic gain from a war and not be involved politically, and loss of profit is not so great a loss as the lives of our sons and other suffering caused by our being involved in war.

To show that the majority of upright business organizations of this country are more concerned with preserving the peace of the United States than in furthering their own gains, I call your attention to the recent refusal on the part of the Bausch & Lomb Optical Co., of Rochester, N. Y., of foreign contracts for military optical supplies amounting to more than $1,500,000. The vice president of this company, in a recent interview, stated that his company did not wish to be put in the position of selling to a foreign government war instruments that might conceivably be used against this country in the event of another world war. Since all our manufacturers do not share these views we need a strong neutrality policy which will prevent all trade with belligerent nations and remove all the profits from war, thereby guaranteeing this country future peace and security. This is true Americanism which has been defined as an unfailing love of country, loyalty to its institutions and ideals, eagerness to defend it against all enemies, undivided allegiance to the flag, and a desire to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity. This creed does not include participation in foreign wars to protect financial and other interests and to prevent this it is imperative that a strong neutrality law be enacted by the present Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BERNARD].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BERNARD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Chairman, the American people who sent me and the rest of this body to Washington want to help the cause of peace. The great body of the American people want to see us adopt a genuine neutrality bill.

I strongly favor such a bill. I desire a neutrality bill which will help peace by not strengthening the war-making forces here and abroad.

An analysis of the Pittman and McReynolds bills show that both measures fail to distinguish between the aggressor nations and their victims. Both bills lump together the robber and the robbed, the murderer and the murdered. We are asked to accept both programs as neutrality programs. We are asked to accept both programs despite the fact recognized all over the world, which was stated in a resolution introduced by me and signed by 18 progressive Members of this body.

It has been definitely established—

This resolution stated—that armed forces of the Governments of Italy, Germany, and Portugal have invaded the territory of Spain and are now actively engaged in a war against the democratically elected Government of that country with which the Government of the United States continues to maintain friendly relations.

The McReynolds bill differs from the Pittman proposal in that it would give the President "discretionary" authority to embargo commodities such as oil, copper, foodstuffs, and autos. Like the Pittman bill, it actually encourages aggression against peaceful and democratic nations. In short, the McReynolds bill, as pointed out by a great number of American citizens and liberal publications in this country, is pro-Fascist. Whether its supporters realize it or not, the McReynolds bill, even more than the Pittman bill, invites Fascist aggression against peaceful countries, against nations friendly to the American Government and its people. Under such so-called neutrality legislation, Hitler, Mussolini, and their gangster accomplices in Lisbon and Tokyo are free to purchase all the supplies they need. At the same time, they are given the assurance that the American Government will place an absolute arms boycott and possible general boycott against any country which the Rome-Berlin-Tokyo Fascist international should decide to invade. In addition, the proposal to include "civil strife" in both the Pittman and McReynolds bills, in the words of the March bulletin of the Methodist Federation for Social Service, "invites the Fascist powers to do elsewhere, perhaps on this continent, what they have done in Spain."

ENCOURAGES AGGRESSORS

Is this neutrality? Decidedly not. This Pittman-McReynolds program objectively helps the reactionaries all over the world. It is not neutrality legislation. It is embargo legislation. Would the McReynolds bill, even assuming that it is proper and humane to assist Nazi warships and bombers, Italian Fascist machine guns, tanks, and flame throwers—would the McReynolds bill help to keep America out of war? It would not. It will not. No law that encourages the aggressive war-making powers to advance their acknowledged antidemocratic program could possibly give any assurance to an America that sincerely wishes to keep out of war.

The United States plays a great and significant role in world affairs. What other powers do cannot but affect this country. What our Government does cannot but affect the attitude of other governments. You will remember, my friends, that I was the only one in the present United States Congress who voted against the resolution which prohibited the shipment of arms and ammunition to the friendly democratically elected Government of Spain. I am proud of that vote. That vote has been acknowledged by freedom lovers all over the world. Now, I do not wish to question the motives of many of my colleagues who sincerely believed that they were helping the cause of neutrality and peace by voting for the administration resolution. However, facts are facts, and the facts show that the passage of the resolution not only deprived a sorely pressed, a literally bleeding people of arms for their self-defense but also encouraged the Nazi-Mussolini governments to believe that they have the approval of the American Government. And more than that, my friends, the rigidly controlled press of Hitler, Goebbels, and Goering, and their big business masters has actually gone to the extent of threatening to take—I quote their words—"an unpleasant interest" in American affairs. I do not have to recite all the details of the recent LaGuardia-Nazi episode. You know that Mayor Fiorello H. LaGuardia, a former distinguished Member of this body, who, like myself, served in France—you know that Mayor LaGuardia merely described Hitler in accurate terms a brown-shirted fanatic, "a menace to the peace of the world", and proposed that the Nazi leader be exhibited in a "hall of horrors" at the world fair.

ATTACK ON LAGUARDIA

This brought forth an unprecedented outburst from the Nazi press against the American people as a group, and against LaGuardia and American womanhood in particular. Many of these Nazi insults are unprintable. I shall only refer to some of the choice conclusions of Nazi officialdom.

Der Angriff, one of the two or three most important Nazi publications, described Mayor LaGuardia as—

A New York gangster, an underworld character, a blackmailer, a man with cheap-joint brains, a pimp, an impertinent Jewish lout, a filthy character * * *.

Even more insulting characterizations, as you know, were made. The 1,200 American women who listened to Mayor LaGuardia were characterized as prostitutes. And what did the Nazi leaders think of the American people in general? Americans, they said, are—

A people who put their feet on the table, keep their hats on indoors, and spit chewing gum against the walls.

The Nazis threatened that if the American people should insist on expressing their hearty dislike for a gang of Fascist ruffians, gangsters, and murderers, they had better look out.

Watch out, America—

Shouted Hitler, Goebbels, and Goering—or we will take an unpleasant interest—

Those are the words that were used—in American affairs.

As you know, Secretary of State Hull saw fit to apologize to the German Government for Mayor LaGuardia's speech, although diplomatic custom did not demand such action. Ambassador Dodd, under State Department instructions, did not demand an apology from the German Government, but made "emphatic comment" to the German Government. Fascism is being nourished by the weakness of democratic governments. And so the Nazis not only did not apologize but informed us that the filthy insults made against a distinguished American, against the American people, were "heroic anger." Some of the Nazi newspaper statements were a little extreme, said the Nazis, but in general, they said, a Nazi insult leveled at the American people is "heroic anger." Why do I cite this incident? Because it shows that failure to recognize aggression, that instituting an arms boycott against an invaded people, leads to encouragement of fascism.

Section 5 of the McReynolds bill would advance the Hitler-Mussolini game one step further by prohibiting, under penalty of a $50,000 fine and a 5-year imprisonment, meetings of freedom-loving Americans held for the purpose of collecting funds to send medical aid and food to the Spanish people. The sponsors of the McReynolds bill were not satisfied with the January resolution, which reversed long-standing international law and the 150-year tradition of this country, to prohibit the sale of arms and ammunition to the democratically elected, friendly, and recognized Government of Spain. They were not satisfied with forcing girls and youngsters to face machine-gun nests with bare hands and scissors. The authors of this bill want to accomplish much more. They wish to keep Americans from giving their nickels and pennies for medicine and bandages which are so badly needed in Spain. In this respect particularly the McReynolds bill is un-American. It would give another helping hand to the Fascist wolves who are now pressing on Madrid in armies conservatively said to number nearly 200,000.

CRIME AGAINST SPANISH PEOPLE

I say that this McReynolds bill, in this respect, especially, would perpetrate a crime against the brave Spanish people. It would penalize a people who against tremendous odds are fighting an invasion being made in the interest of Fascism, in the interest of feudalism and brutal reaction. Let me be clearly understood. Whether you realize it or not, the passage of this section would condemn many brave men and women to death who might otherwise be saved. This would be a crime against humanity. This would be going against the anti-Fascist sentiments which were so clearly expressed by the American people when they rejected Mr. Landon and his Liberty League, Mr. Landon and his union-busting backers. The adoption of this section would push forward the Fascist pestilence which the powers of Rome, Berlin, and Lisbon are seeking to fasten on Spain.

Mr. MCREYNOLDS attacked those Americans who, as civil-service employees of the "Social Security Board Union", had the rashness to exercise their constitutional and traditional right to inform Mr. MCREYNOLDS that his "so-called neutrality bill is actually not a neutrality bill, but pro-Fascist and not in keeping with American traditions." For this reason these American citizens urged the defeat of the McReynolds bill. Mr. MCREYNOLDS' answer was to threaten legislation which would prevent the exercise of such a legal right by American citizens who happen to be working under civil service. "Such people," said Mr. MCREYNOLDS last Friday on the floor of this House, "every one of them ought to be fired." It seems that Mr. MCREYNOLDS would like to establish, in Hitler fashion, a class of secondary American citizens.

Secretary of State Hull was wiser than Mr. MCREYNOLDS. Realizing that a great number of American citizens, including a distinguished officeholder and numerous professional men and women, strenuously objected to the recent unprecedented State Department ruling which denied visas to Americans desiring to serve the bleeding Spanish people in a purely medical capacity as doctors, nurses, ambulance drivers, and medical technicians. Secretary Hull was quick to reverse the State Department ruling. The State Department, unlike Mr. MCREYNOLDS, saw the wisdom of recognizing the sentiment of the American people. The opposition to that section of the McReynolds bill which would prevent the holding of meetings to collect funds for medical assistance for the Spanish people, Mr. MCREYNOLDS declared last Friday, "seems to create a great uproar from a certain class of people in this country." Well, with great pride I wish to inform the House that one of this "certain class of people" was Elmer Benson, former United States Senator and the present Farmer-Labor Governor of Minnesota. Governor Benson is the sort of official who refuses to allow the militia company thugs and gunmen to shoot down workers and strikers. He is the sort of man who refuses to allow company spies to molest the citizens of his State. Governor Benson is the sort of man who used his office to feed and house recent lumber strikers, who for many years have been exploited by the lumber kings of America.

GOVERNOR BENSON PROTESTS BILL

Governor Benson, that Farmer-Labor Governor whom Mr. MCREYNOLDS would relegate to a secondary class, telegraphed as follows to Chairman MCREYNOLDS, of the House Foreign Affairs Committee:

I want to express my protest against that portion of the McReynolds neutrality bill which bars the collection of funds to send medical supplies and food to suffering victims of aggressive wars and imperialistic ventures. This is unprecedented in modern civilization and contrary to ideals of the American Red Cross.

The telegram of Governor Benson states the real and traditional American position. It recognizes the anti-Fascist sentiment of the American people. That is where I stand. That is where other Americans, millions of them, stand. I say that the American people voted anti-Fascist when they defeated Landon and his Liberty League and German Nazi backers. America, and by America I mean the people, and not the Liberty League and the National Association of Manufacturers and their reactionary supporters—I say America is opposed to bowing before the Fascist monster or to give way one inch before any threats made by Hitler or Mussolini.

The American people, the workers, farmers, doctors, lawyers, and the white-collar class do not wish to assist Hitler and Mussolini. They do not approve of the attempt of General Franco and his employers to fasten fascism on Spain. They do not approve of the $3,000,000 credit made to the Italian Government by the Export-Import Bank. The thousands of tons of shoes and clothing actually made by American workers and sent to the Spanish people, the tons of medical supplies, the ambulances, doctors, nurses, and medical technicians sent to aid the Spanish people by millions of Americans who themselves need their every penny—all this attests to the fact that our people are opposed to fascism, that our people are opposed to such legislation as is embodied in this bill. The American people have not swallowed that Fascist propaganda which would have us believe that the fight in Spain is a fight between fascism and communism. They have not swallowed the reactionary propaganda which would have us believe that the Mohammedan Moors and foreign legionnaire criminals are being used to protect the Christian Church in Spain. The American people know that the German-Italian-Portuguese invasion of Spain was planned in Berlin and Rome, and that it is being carried on in the main by Berlin and Rome. The American people know that the bulk of those fighting against Franco, Hitler, and Mussolini are Catholics, as shown in studies made by such disinterested parties as the Foreign Policy Association and the New York Post, a strong pro-Roosevelt paper. They know that Franco has shot many Catholic priests who supported their people, great numbers of them Catholics, against the Fascist insurrection. What is more important and significant, the American people are beginning to realize that the Fascist invasion of Spain is something which affects their own democratic interests. Thus, my friends, those of us who will fight this pro-Fascist section of the McReynolds bill, those of us who will vote against this McReynolds bill will be heeding the anti-Fascist and pro-democratic wishes of the American people.

I say that it is time that we stopped giving aid and comfort to Mussolini and Hitler and to their reactionary American sympathizers and supporters. I say that it is time we did something which would demonstrate in deeds that we believe that democracy is worth more than an annual lip-serving Fourth of July oration. As the March bulletin of the Methodist Federation for Social Service declared—

> We want a world organized around the democratic way of life. The Fascists are determined to destroy that way of life and to do it by merciless warfare. * * *

Take this section 5 out of the McReynolds bill! Vote against this bill! Vote, my friends, for democracy! Vote against fascism! Vote in favor of the traditions which brought the American Revolutionary War to victory over British feudalism, British monarchy, and which brought victory to the Union over chattel slavery in our own Civil War.

Therefore I urge you to vote against the McReynolds bill and to put an end to a situation which aids fascism by penalizing its victims. [Applause.]

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs if, in the event this bill is passed and signed by the President, and if it is found that Germany or Italy is sending arms and munitions and implements of war and men into Spain, as has just been charged, the President, through the discretionary powers in this bill, would have the right to declare an embargo against Germany and Italy?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The President would not, except if we found such a situation arising where he would have to declare that war existed. Then he would.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to confine my remarks to section 4, the commodities section of this bill. I have read the hearings on the bill in both the Senate and the House, and to date I have failed to find the source of this very important section.

It has been demonstrated in the House today that the more or less radical element, so to speak, have expressed their views on neutrality. That certainly was true before the committee. The National Council for the Prevention of War testified. The executive secretary of the Socialist Party testified. The American League Against War and Fascism testified. The North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy testified. I fear that this element has had something to do with the inclusion of the commodity section in this bill. I was surprised to find that section there when I read the legislation. It was not considered last year. I most certainly prefer the McReynolds section on commodities to the Pittman section, because it does give us a chance that the President will not, except in dire need, put this section into effect. It is the lesser of two evils.

I want to say here as a representative from a farming district that it is my opinion that if we pass the Pittman bill and ever try to put it into effect, the section dealing with commodities, which ties up our merchant marine at the dock and says to the nations that are able to some here and pay for these goods, if they pay cash, that they may come and get them, it will stop the necessary imports and this Nation will be up in arms in 30 days demanding repeal of that provision.

Now, who can say they are the sponsors of this commodity section? I want to read to you the testimony of the Assistant Secretary of State before the Senate committee on this subject:

> There is another thing that is quite important; that is, the more legislation you put on the statute books which tends to tie the hands of the Government, the more definitely you advertise to war-minded nations what they can count upon when war occurs.

That, to me, points out the danger of the immediate effect on world trade of the adoption of this section regulating trade in commodities.

It goes on to say:

> There is another consideration. I do not think we ought to enact domestic legislation which will induce all the other nations of the world to channel their trade to other markets than the American market, expecting that a war may occur and that they will be forced to deal with other countries. As, for instance, they will be forced to go to Brazil for cotton instead of coming to the United States.

Nowhere can you find the State Department in favor of this commodities section. I point out to the House that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs himself said on this floor that if he had his way all reference to commodities would be left out of this bill. With that in view, when the bill is read under the 5-minute rule, I am going to offer an amendment to strike out section 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON] has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, all of us, of course, have very definite convictions with reference to the more controversial provisions of the pending bill and of the Pittman bill. In the time at my disposal this afternoon I want to address myself to a provision in the McReynolds bill that I believe should be amended, and to an amendment that I propose to offer at the proper time, which, I feel, should not be controversial. The provision to which I call attention is section 5 (a), appearing on page 23 of the bill. The bill provides that whenever the President shall have issued a proclamation, and so forth, it shall be unlawful—

> To solicit or receive any contribution for any such government or political subdivision or any person acting for or on behalf of such government or subdivision.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this provision would prohibit American citizens from soliciting or contributing to a fund to be used for the purpose of turning over to any government engaged in war medical aid or assistance, or even food or clothing, for noncombatants. I appreciate the fact that this language of the bill is subject to different interpretations. I know the distinguished chairman of this committee takes the position that it would not necessarily restrict the operations of committees or groups in this country who wanted to give medical aid or assistance, or food and clothing, to noncombatants, provided they did not make the contributions to the government engaged in the war. If they made the contributions directly to the government, they would, of course, be prohibited under the language of the McReynolds bill; but I submit to the distinguished chairman of the committee and to the members of the committee that there are times when an agent of a government involved in war is about the only person to whom citizens of this country could make contributions.

Obviously, any person who would be willing to carry on the responsibility of distributing this food or this medical aid and assistance would necessarily be one who was very definitely in the conflict on one side or the other, and the language of this bill would prohibit the use of those agencies even though the money solicited and collected in this country were used only for medical aid and assistance or for food and clothing for noncombatants. I propose, therefore, at the proper time to offer an amendment which I feel will meet the views of those interested in this subject matter and accomplish what should be a proper policy for us to pursue.

On page 24, line 2, after the word "subdivision", I would add the following language:

Except for the purpose of providing medical aid and assistance or for the purpose of providing food and clothing to relieve human suffering among noncombatants.

I believe this language is such as to carry out a policy that we should all agree on; in other words, Americans could solicit funds or contribute funds in this country for medical aid or assistance either to combatants or noncombatants, but in the matter of food and clothing it would go only to those men, women, and children who were not actually combatants.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I submit that even though we are as sincere as I know all of us here are to prevent this country from becoming involved in war, although we abhor war, I do not believe that we should pursue a policy that will prohibit American citizens from contributing of their own means for the purpose of helping suffering humanity in other countries in the event of war. I do not believe we should do anything that would get us involved in war from the standpoint of participating in the conflict, as I believe in real neutrality and I am in favor of neutrality legislation. I believe we should go as far as we can to guarantee neutrality. However, I do not believe that in the name of neutrality we should forget those finer instincts of humanity and close our eyes to the suffering of men, women, and children who are in need of medical aid and assistance and those men, women, and children who are not actually fighting and who need food and clothing if we have citizens in this country who are willing to volunteer a part of their own wealth to that humane cause. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, this bill, the McReynolds neutrality bill, has been so thoroughly discussed that I imagine nearly everyone has made up his mind as to what he intends to do about it. I take this time to discuss it not so much with the hope that I may be able to persuade others to my own views upon it but rather for the purpose of making a record of those views, and thus to indicate them a little more definitely than the record of the vote alone would indicate them.

At the outset, Mr. Chairman, I desire to congratulate the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee and its distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS], for the painstaking study they have given to the subject of neutrality and for bringing in a sincere, carefully thought-out legislative proposal. I also wish to congratulate the Members of the House upon the nonpartisan manner in which they have carried on this discussion. To me this has been one of the most refreshing and purposeful of all the debates I have listened to since I have been in Congress. Furthermore, the committee is to be congratulated for bringing out legislation of its own. This legislation did not originate in the executive department, as has been the case with so much of our major legislation. It was not sent here with an order from the White House to pass it. This legislation actually was evolved here in Congress, where all legislation ought to originate; and I hope the present consideration of this bill under these happy circumstances may portend a return by the Congress to its original function as the lawmaking body of the Nation. Too long has the Congress in matters of major legislation been merely an adjunct of the executive department of the Government. Let us hope that from now on other committees of the House will follow this example of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and that they will make and write their own bills upon the legislative problems over which they have jurisdiction.

Now, as to the merit of the proposal reported to us by this committee. I think there are parts of this bill which are excellent. Section 3 could not be improved on in my opinion. It handles the matter of arms embargoes to belligerent countries plainly and definitely, and its provisions are mandatory. If I had my way about it I would go a little bit further even than section 3, and I would prohibit the shipment of arms and munitions to any country at any time. I think the United States could well afford to not allow the exportation of war materials under any circumstances, and I think an amendment to that effect would improve and strengthen the bill.

I believe the requirements in the bill prohibiting the citizens of the United States from making loans or extending credit to belligerents is a good provision. That certainly will tend to keep us out of war. The provision prohibiting American citizens from traveling on belligerent vessels in time of war is also sound, and that provision by all means should be retained.

Now, it seems to me those are the proposals of the bill which we all pretty generally agree upon and which nearly all of us think should be enacted into permanent law. But it also seems to me that when we go further at this time than the enactment of those particular provisions we are venturing somewhat into the realm of speculation and are entering upon an uncharted sea of legislation. For the present, might it not be a good idea to simply take those parts of the bill that we are generally already agreed upon, enact them into law now, and defer action upon the more speculative portions of the bill until a later time? That, it seems to me, would be the part of wisdom and good reason under the circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, I have the further thought that if it is going to be the policy of Congress in event of war between foreign nations to lay an embargo upon commodities other than war materials, as provided in section 4—if that is to be the policy of the Congress in the future—then it seems to me that the proper thing for the Congress to do would be to lay down that policy in a mandatory law, leaving nothing to the discretion of the President, but simply providing that the President shall execute and enforce the law when the emergency arises.

I doubt both the wisdom and the necessity of giving to the President the wide discretionary power that would be vested in him under section 4 if this bill should become law. Such discretion, if exercised in certain emergencies, might well tend to involve us in war rather than keep us out of it.

This is new and experimental legislation. Let us not move too hastily to enact the entire proposal into law when there is no real necessity for haste. Let us enact that part of the bill which is mandatory and which we nearly all agree is necessary. Let us defer action for the time being upon that part of the bill which is entirely speculative and experimental and which gives to the President discretionary power to put into effect a far-reaching neutrality policy upon which the Congress itself admittedly is not agreed.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. COFFEE].

THE M'REYNOLDS BILL IS SUBJECT TO FOUR OBJECTIONS

Mr. COFFEE of Washington. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time allotted to me I shall not have time to yield for any questions.

There are four objections to the McReynolds bill, as I view the matter, and I will state them as briefly and as hastily as I can.

One of them is the fact it contains an interdictment of medical aid, food, and humanitarian help to friendly democratic governments menaced by Fascist foes from without. In other words, the effect of this bill is to aid the Fascist group that is now invading Spain and it comforts and gives benefit to those Fascist forces that are trying to destroy friendly democratic governments everywhere.

Second, the McReynolds bill is discretionary neutrality and not mandatory neutrality. In that respect I prefer the Pittman bill.

Third, the McReynolds measure provides for the exemption of the American republics from the provisions of the bill. In this respect it contains a provision which is entirely incompatible with the very word "neutrality." If we are going to undertake the defense of the existing governments in South America, we will have to acquire one of the largest navies on the face of the earth, and I shall not subscribe to any doctrine—which may be advocated by the big-army and big-navy people of this country and all the jingoes that fill the daily newspapers with editorials—to provide an excuse for them to encourage us to authorize larger appropriations than ever before for our Army and Navy. You cannot have neutrality and at the same time say that neutrality bill will not apply to the existing South American governments, all of which, south of Mexico, are military dictatorships.

The fourth objection I have to the bill is that it contains no embargo or peacetime quota for the sale of raw war materials. Why should we not embargo the sale of war munitions to any country on earth in time of peace? Or do we prefer to make a profit on the sale of munitions to these countries? Why is it that the Wall Street market now reflects the sale of war munitions to Great Britain, to France, Italy, Portugal, and to Germany at this very time? Why is it the price of copper has gone up? Why is it the Steel Corporation is more docile to the demands of organized labor than formerly? Is it because they are selling so many more steel products and munitions now to the bellicose nations of Europe than heretofore?

WHY NOT A PEACETIME QUOTA OF ESSENTIAL WAR MATERIALS?

Mr. Chairman, if we believe in real neutrality why do we not do what the Pittman bill, introduced in the last Congress, provided for? That is, for a peacetime quota on the sale of raw war materials and only permit the sale of such raw materials to the belligerent nations as have been shipped to them in a certain number of preceding years, this to be prescribed by the President of the United States? I hope someone will introduce an amendment limiting the sale of raw materials to a peacetime quota. This provision is advocated by Stephen Raushenbush, special investigator for the Senate Munitions Committee. The wartime quota proportion, to combat the war-boom psychology, is advocated by every peace-loving organization in the United States.

The objections to the bill, which I have just enumerated, reflect in whole or in part the attitude of the American League Against War and Fascism, Foreign Policy Association, the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, National Council for Prevention of War, the Emergency Peace Foundation, American Youth Congress, and the leading liberal organizations in the United States, all of which have pointed the finger of objection against the McReynolds bill on the ground it neither embargoes the sale of raw materials, which could be made into war materials, nor does it limit it to a peacetime quota.

I. WHY PENALIZE FRIENDLY DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENTS?

Let me briefly amplify my first objection. I read from Norman Thomas, who wrote in a letter to myself the following:

> In particular we denounce the section of the McReynolds bill which seeks to stop the collection of any funds, even for feeding children, for either side of the Spanish struggle. In effect, this will hurt only the loyalists, for whom practically all funds are being raised. This is an utterly unprecedented and unwarranted extension of governmental power, without tenable excuse, over the conscience of Americans who want, like their forefathers, to support the cause of justice and peace. It will make the Spanish struggle more, not less, an issue in American politics. It must be defeated.

The following people and organizations urge that section 5 of the McReynolds bill be defeated: Washington Commonwealth Federation; Methodist Federation for Social Service; United Christian Council for Democracy; the Nation; the New Republic; the Witness (Episcopal magazine); the New York Daily Post; the Philadelphia Daily Record; the Friends of Spanish Democracy; the American League Against War and Fascism. Recently a group of 98 liberals, including Albert Einstein, Dr. John Dewey, ex-Congressman Vito Marcantonio, Prof. Paul H. Douglas, Mrs. Lorado Taft, Prof. Robert Morss Lovett, among others, convened and issued a statement, to which all affixed their signatures:

> We desire most ardently to continue to be good neighbors to the men, women, and children of friendly democratic nations. To aid the Spanish people now is in accord with our historic traditions and with the demands of justice and mercy. We desire most emphatically to record our opposition to those sections of the bill proposed by Congressman McREYNOLDS which would add to the recently adopted neutrality bill a prohibition against solicitation of funds in the United States to aid the women and children of Spain.

NUMEROUS LIBERALS DENOUNCE PROVISION AGAINST SOLICITATION OF AID

Among the leading and most brilliant liberals and intellectuals in America will be found Bishop Francis J. McConnell, of the Methodist Church; Bishop Robert L. Paddock, of the Episcopal Church; Devere Allen; Historian Harry Elmer Barnes; Alfred Bingham; Columnist Heywood Broun; Sherwood Eddy; Rabbi Stephen S. Wise; Dr. Cannon, of Harvard; Dr. John Siegerist, of Johns Hopkins University; Corliss Lamont; Gardner Jackson; Bruce Bliven; Prof. Henry Pratt Fairchild; and novelists John Dos Passos and Waldo Frank. These and scores of others, including the most profound students of international relations, have inveighed against section 5 of the McReynolds bill because it, in effect, puts this country in alliance with the Fascists who, with the brazen aid of two foreign dictatorships, are attempting to tear down the existing democratic Government of Spain.

The Pittman bill contains no such prohibition against the solicitation of funds for the benefit of women and children.

The McReynolds bill is highly significant and dangerous to world peace, and, a fortori, lends actual encouragement to Fascist aggression, in that it fails to distinguish between defender and aggressor in foreign civil or international wars.

II. MANDATORY NEUTRALITY PREFERRED

I object strongly to the McReynolds bill, in the second place, because I believe that the burden of deciding upon policies of neutrality rests upon the elected representatives of the people and should be mandatory, as opposed to the discretionary powers provided in the instant measure. In this objection to Presidential discretionary powers in neutrality I am bolstered and encouraged by the categorical opposition to discretionary neutrality evidenced by the attitude of leading peace organizations in the United States. Particularly bitter was the opposition of many of my home people to discretionary powers, as shown by a vote taken at a meeting held in the city of Tacoma, Wash., on February 8, 1937, when 997 members of an audience gathered together under the sponsorship of the Emergency Peace Foundation voted for mandatory neutrality as contrasted with 3 only who voted for discretionary neutrality. A brilliant young man in my State of Washington by the name of Calvin J. Nichols has repeatedly urged upon me bitter opposition to any provision in neutrality bills which accord to the President, or to any individual, latitude or discretion in the matter of banning munitions or materials of war. Mr. Nichols has rallied thousands of earnest citizens in my congressional district behind him in this stand. No matter how much one respects our President—and I honor and admire him tremendously—no human being in the President's chair can be expected to carry such a load without making a mistake. The Congress should decline to confer upon any President such a tremendous power, carrying within itself peace or war at the stroke of a pen.

III. WHY EXEMPT SOUTH AND CENTRAL AMERICAN REPUBLICS FROM NEUTRALITY LAWS?

Section 11 of the McReynolds bill attempts to apply the Monroe Doctrine to neutrality. It states that "this act shall not apply to American republics engaged in war against non-American states * * *." In other words, we shall legislate with respect to munitions with reference to our trade with all the world except South American republics. Personally, I believe this provision in the bill contravenes neutrality and is altogether incompatible with our purported peace-loving attitude toward the world. Why enshroud these countries with protection while refusing to sell munitions elsewhere? The Monroe Doctrine is not international law. It is a statement of national policy. Former Senator Bingham, of Connecticut, while a professor at Yale, wrote a monumental work entitled "The Monroe Doctrine—An Obsolete Shibboleth", in which the whole fallacy of underwriting South American dictatorships is explained. In his book-writing days, prior to his inoculation with the virus of conservatism in the Senate, Senator Bingham resembled somewhat his brilliant son, Alfred, in his international outlook.

Personally, I dislike to see our country linked in any way with the Fascist republics of South America, which would lend encouragement to the spread of fascism and military dictatorship already too prevalent in Central and South American countries.

IV. THE PUBLIC DEMANDS AN EMBARGO OR PEACETIME QUOTA ON SALE OF ESSENTIAL WAR MATERIALS

My fourth objection to the McReynolds bill is based upon the failure of this measure to provide for regulation or embargo of the sale and shipment of essential—raw—materials of war. To my mind this is a vital and decisive omission in the McReynolds and Pittman bills. Both bills allow the building up in our country, as in 1914–17, of a vast trade in everything except munitions, and the President is not authorized to stop it. His authority is limited under both bills to the prevention of the transportation in vessels of American registry of such articles and materials as he may name. The McReynolds bill, unlike the Pittman bill, contains no prohibition upon arming of American merchant vessels. In the McReynolds bill it is discretionary with the President to prohibit American citizens traveling on vessels. There is no provision as to aircraft. Whereas in the Pittman bill there is a prohibition—with exceptions—on American citizens traveling on vessels, or aircraft, of belligerents. In the Pittman bill no materials whatever shall be allowed to leave the country until all ownership and interest in them have been transferred to the foreign purchaser. While in the McReynolds bill the requirement that title shall pass to foreigners—as in Pittman bill—shall be invoked only when the President so decides.

DO WE CANONIZE WAR PROFITS?

In other words, by virtue of pending neutrality measures, America may sell raw or essential materials of war which directly contribute to the success or failure of the belligerent in time of war, provided title passes to the purchaser, and/or the goods are shipped in vessels flying a foreign flag. The bills should contain a provision limiting the sale of such materials to the same amount as was sold to the country prior to its engaging in war. Such a provision would eliminate war booms, the principal cause for war.

The McReynolds bill fails to take the profit out of war. It merely provides we may continue to do an abnormal business in the sale of raw material providing the vendees thereof pay cash therefor on the barrel head and ship it in their own vessels. Why not embargo or limit the sale of such material? Do we put dollars above human lives? Are we so interested in war profits that we would lay the trail again to the spot out of which escape is impossible? Have we forgotten the lessons of the World War?

WORLD WAR EPISODES SHOULD EDUCATE US

Our neutrality policy on loans to belligerents proclaimed in August 1914 was changed in the summer of 1915, due to the pressure of the war boom then enveloping our entire national economy. (Vid. Senate Munitions Committee report: Senate Rept. 944, pt. 5, on existing legislation, ch. IV, pp. 59 through 65. On pp. 64 and 65 will be found the now famous Lansing letter to President Wilson outlining the alternative of panic to the country unless the ban on loans was dropped.) The then Secretary of the Treasury, McAdoo, wrote to President Wilson on August 21, 1915, a letter in which he points out the prosperity which the Great War trade was bringing to the United States and the necessity of permitting large loans to the Allies in order to continue this prosperity. (Vid. exhibit 2219, in pt. 26 of the Senate Munitions Committee hearings on World War financing.)

President Wilson and Secretary of State Lansing made a proposal to the Allied Governments in the World War to humanize submarine warfare by making allied merchantmen carry no mounted arms and insisting that the German submarines apply the international-law rule of visit and search. The Germans insisted they could not do this as long as enemy merchantmen were armed and attacked them. Although Wilson and Lansing said they thought it a just and reasonable way of attempting to settle the submarine controversy, or at least help remove the reason for the submarine sinkings without warning, the plan was dropped when England indicated her opposition to it. At the time our Ambassador in London, Page, cabled to Washington that if we insisted on it England might have to cut down very materially on her war orders here. Here we have the same old snarl—the threat of hurting our war trade, which had grown to great proportions by January 1916, when the proposal was made. In fact, the reason the United States failed to take a firm stand against Great Britain because of her seizure of our ships and illegally interfering with their cargoes may be found in the Senate hearings, where there is set forth a long memorandum of the Department of Commerce in October 1916 pointing out that for the United States to use retaliatory powers against England "would be more detrimental to our own war trade than to the British."

More than $7,000,000,000 worth of American securities are now foreign owned. There is no telling what they could do to start a first-class war boom here in case of a European war.

WE CAN AFFORD TO FOREGO WAR TRADE

It is generally contended that this country cannot afford to take steps to hold trade down to normal in time of a foreign war. This absurdity may readily be controverted by the retort that in any war of major size we would lose, always, the trade of those belligerents who have no access to our ports. In the next war we may thus expect to lose the trade of Germany and Italy. That business approximates $250,000,000 a year. In normal times, with no neutrality law, we would offset that loss many times over by additional sales to England and France, assuming these latter to have control of the seas. If normal peacetime quotas are enacted, we could make up the loss by increased trade with Latin America. I am convinced that England and France are going to have more of their merchantmen sunk in the next than in the last war and are going to concentrate the rest on the short travel routes. We will get most of the British trade in South America. In any event, the sum of $250,000,000, less than the cost of the W. P. A. for 2 months, is insignificant compared to our expenditure in a war we would inevitably enter, because we would not dare let the war boom collapse.

WHY PUT TRUST IN "CASH AND CARRY"?

The cash-and-carry policy so much stressed in neutrality debate has not been a deterrent to trade. Most of the war material trade shipped in 1914–16 was carried in foreign bottoms, not American. Great Britain's vast holdings in American securities here now provides sufficient cash to buy at once without the need of loans. The people of America feel strongly about the sale of munitions. We refuse now to abolish the sale of munitions to foreign countries. We refuse in time of war to eliminate the sale of essential war materials, merely circumscribing such business with cash-and-carry and foreign-flag requirements. If we make it possible for a boom period in the raw materials needed for war preparation, all of the good intentions in the world will not be able to prevent our being inveigled into the next war. It would serve as an excellent chance for an entering wedge for propaganda of all sorts. If we leave a loophole in neutrality legislation, so that war trade is encouraged, by the time war breaks out we will be so tied up commercially that we will follow the same path we took in 1914–17.

Americans have a naive faith in the power of laws. Frequently one hears the expression "There ought to be a law." I have no such puerile confidence in the preventive qualities of legal enactment. If the American people can be hysterically moved by a furore of war fever, no neutrality laws on earth can stay their course.

The test of neutrality is the willingness of our lawmakers to extirpate war profits. We fail to do this in the pending neutrality bills. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, I do not appear before you to discuss the question of neutrality with the view of bringing to you any superior wisdom or any great knowledge upon the subject, for I confess that the question of neutrality is to a great extent more or less novel with all of us and that many, including myself, have a very limited knowledge of the subject. The able chairman and members of the committee have unquestionably worked very diligently upon this question, and I do not wish to question their sincerity or their patriotism. Surely it is the desire of the Members of this House to pass such legislation as in our opinion will more nearly keep us out of war.

I think the bill presented to us by the committee is, on the whole, very good. I believe that it represents a very serious effort to achieve the objective that is so much to be desired, namely, the prevention of war. I much prefer to be in absolute harmony with the committee and I regret that in this case I find it impossible for me to agree with the provisions of the bill now before us. I shall support some amendments which will no doubt be offered, but, after all is done that can be done, the bill in all probability will have my support for final passage.

MAIN DIFFERENCE BETWEEN THE PITTMAN BILL AND MCREYNOLDS BILL

As a new Member of this House I was not privileged to have the benefit of the discussion incident to the passage of the present neutrality law, but I have endeavored to analyze the McReynolds bill and I have tried to compare it with the Pittman bill which the Senate has passed, and I have hurriedly scanned the hearings held by the House committee. While perhaps some of us would like to see even the Pittman bill go further than it does, it probably represents the best neutrality legislation that can be obtained at this time. It therefore becomes necessary to ascertain the differences between the two bills. When boiled down to its last analysis, it appears that the material difference is the question of discretion. The Pittman bill provides for a so-called mandatory neutrality, although even it gives the President very wide discretion. The McReynolds bill provides for a purely discretionary neutrality. Mr. Chairman, in the deep South, from whence I come, we have an expression when speaking of a fence, to "make it hog tight and bull strong." I wish to make it as nearly impossible as can be for us to be drawn into war. My firm conviction is that mandatory neutrality will go further to achieve this than discretionary neutrality.

FREEDOM OF THE SEAS—ITS COST IN DOLLARS AND MEN

The greatest objection to mandatory neutrality, if I correctly understand the remarks made on the floor of this House, is the age-old question of the freedom of the seas. We are asked if America now proposes to turn about face and renounce this principle. Let us see where the so-called principle of freedom of the seas has carried us. Will anyone deny that this principle was largely responsible for our entry into the World War? Where is the home in this land that has not been vitally touched by the hand of fate in dealing with this question? Need we recount the billions of dollars that we spent in the World War? Is not the memory of the billions still owed us by Europe fresh in our minds? Are not the battlefields of Europe filled with precious American manhood sacrificed in an effort to perpetuate it? Where is the home in America that does not have some vacant chair, some maimed or crippled father, some blighted life, resulting from the World War? Who respects the principle, anyway, when war comes? We all would like to have real freedom of the seas, but do we in fact have it?

HUMANITY BEFORE PROFITS

My friends, the trouble with us in America is that we look too much to the dollar. Despite the carnage incident to the World War we do not yet seem to realize that we must place men before dollars—humanity before profits. It seems to me that America must establish once and for all the higher principle that humanity comes before profits. Our trouble is that we want neutrality, but we do not want it to interfere with our profits. Sacrifice is always hard to make. We try to hold on to our trade with one hand and to write a neutrality bill with the other hand. We must remember—yea, we should have remembered—that we cannot have our pie and eat it. The price of greed is written on European battlefields in American blood so clearly that none can fail to understand. Shall we continue our mad rush for profits? Shall we insist on trading when and where and with whom we please at the cost of human lives? Or shall we forego some trade, some profits, for peace? Such peace can be had with honor.

WE NEED MANDATORY NEUTRALITY

The McReynolds bill places an embargo upon implements of war, and that is good. They tell us that under the bill the President has the discretion to forbid other commodities being exported to belligerents in American ships, and so he has, but therein lies the trouble. We are called upon here to say to the President of the United States that he and he alone shall fix the limitations and exceptions to the law; that he shall decide what commodities can be carried in American vessels, and to whom and when; that the cash-and-carry provision shall depend upon the limitations and exceptions he alone shall determine. Is this neutrality? Mandatory neutrality announces to the world beforehand that we will not take any direct action that would hurt or help either side in a conflict. Discretionary neutrality enables the President, after the conflict has started, to say what our course shall be, what shall be shipped. Is it not entirely possible—yea, even probable—that such discretion, such decision, after a war has started might be interpreted as a hostile act? Certainly everyone must see that any such act—for instance, an embargo on cotton or on steel or on copper—will vitally affect one of any two nations that might go to war. Can anyone argue that the nation so adversely affected would not be offended? I repeat, is that neutrality? But if we should declare beforehand, declare now, by legislative edict that if countries want to fight they can expect us to take no part whatsoever, not even to the extent of permitting American ships to carry goods to the belligerents, and providing for a purely cash-and-carry trade, such as the Senate bill provides, then they would know definitely what to depend upon, what our course would be, and no one would have any right to complain.

DISCRETIONARY NEUTRALITY PLACES TOO MUCH POWER IN HANDS OF PRESIDENT

The Constitution gives to the Congress the right and responsibility of declaring war. May I digress here to say that I strongly favor letting the people who do the fighting decide whether or not they want to fight. That would go further to eliminate war than anything else that I know of. But this bill proposes to place in the hands of the President the unprecedented power of alone determining the course of this Nation in the event war breaks out among other nations.

As pointed out before, his discretion in forbidding the exportation of materials might certainly lead to war, and it is therefore tantamount to the President of the United States alone having the power to declare war. I am unwilling to place upon the shoulders of any man this very grave responsibility. We have never yet in America had any President on whom the Creator has bestowed wisdom enough to discharge the responsibility of declaring war. In the United States we have gone far toward delegating authority to the Chief Executive, but I do not believe that the American people have reached the point where they would place in the hands of any Chief Executive the power to determine the destiny of the flower of American manhood. Moreover, everyone knows that in our great complex governmental system the President must necessarily rely upon the advice of some subordinate. Some minor official, in the State Department, for instance, might be watching the course of battle between two powers and might recommend a course that would lead to war. Here we would have the case of a minor State Department official guessing wrong, and thus perhaps another world war would follow. The risk is too great. Who wants to take the chance? Mandatory neutrality would prevent such an error.

Effort has been made, without actually asserting it, to create the impression that the bill now before us is an administration bill. Let us look at that phase of the matter for a moment. I think it may be said that the administration has not endorsed this bill. I note in the hearings on page 25 where Mr. Hackworth, of the State Department, said:

Mr. Chairman, I think I ought to make it clear to the committee that the State Department is not advocating any particular bill. We are merely here to try to be helpful if we can, in answering any question that might be in your mind. But we are not advocating any particular legislation, and I would not want that impression to go out.

Again the next day Mr. Hackworth said to the committee:

As I said yesterday * * * the Department is not advocating any particular bill. Neither this bill nor the bill in the Senate should be regarded as the Department's bill.

Can anyone, in the face of these plain statements, contend that this is the administration bill? Mr. Chairman, the Senate of the United States has passed the Pittman bill, which is far more mandatory than this bill and far more satisfactory. The proponents of the McReynolds bill seem to be much opposed to the Pittman bill. May we not with equal, or greater force, contend that the Pittman bill in the Senate was the administration bill? Did not the Pittman bill pass almost unanimously? Do we not find administration stalwarts in the Senate supporting that bill? Certainly, Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, we have a right to support the principle of either one of these bills without criticism from any source for our position.

Ladies and gentlemen, in conclusion let me express the hope that a benign Providence will lead the Congress to do the thing that is best for the American people, and regardless of what the outcome of this bill might be I feel that every Member wants to outlaw war. Give us a neutrality law "hog tight and bull strong." [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS. Mr. Chairman, in general, I agree with the point of view expressed by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KOPPLEMANN], and, if I understand aright, the amendments which he suggests, I probably shall vote for them.

May I express the hope that the chairman of the committee will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] for an addition of language to the section which forbids solicitations and collections on behalf of foreign governments. And may I say that I am in agreement with practically everything said by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

I should like to pay my sincere compliments to the Foreign Relations Committee for the long hours of hard work and earnest thought they have given to the drafting of the measure which we are now considering.

SOME MISTAKEN IDEAS

I want to remove some misconceptions. First, the legislation before us does not imply—no neutrality legislation implies—a weakening of national defense. It should not and does not mean that you weaken your own defenses merely because you do not jump into every fight.

Second, no one can be certain that even the strongest possible neutrality measure, which I am afraid this measure is not, will keep America out of war. This is only one of the things we need to do. There are many others. Indeed, partly as a measure of national defense, partly as a means of minimizing war in the world, I would be for prohibiting the export of munitions, arms, and implements of war at anytime, in peace or war. If we did this, it is charged other nations would arm more than they do now. That is not true. They are arming now as much as they can afford to do. The limit is their pocketbook. Our refusal to sell munitions would not make that pocketbook any bigger.

The people expect us to do our best for peace. We can do no less if we keep faith with them.

COURAGE, SACRIFICE, THE PRICE OF PEACE

Third, I have been much disappointed to hear so much talk in the debate which, all boiled down, amounts to this: "How can we avoid war and still not make a single sacrifice of any trade or any rights or anything we like to do?" The answer is, "We cannot." And if we try to frame a law along those lines, it will not be any good as a peace measure. We can only keep out of war if we make sacrifices commensurate with that great objective. It is a great and courageous objective, not a cowardly one, as some suggest. Civilization is at stake. Some nation, some people has got to save it. And I think the nation that saves civilization will have to be one that remains at peace. The only cowardly thing is to try to make war profits and still keep out of war. The price you pay for making war profits is, always has been, and, I think, always ought to be war itself. We know what happened the last time we made war profits.

I am desperately eager to keep America out of war. Therefore, I am interested in a type of neutrality legislation that will make war profits and a war-trade boom impossible. If it takes embargoes on munitions, loans, and credits, as it will, I am for that. If it takes embargoes on materials used in making munitions and articles used directly in the conduct of war, I am for that. If it requires keeping American vessels out of the war zone, I am for that; but neither of the bills provides for it. A cash-and-carry provision is, I know, a compromise. It is a compromise which we are compelled to accept because we believe we cannot succeed in cutting off all trade with belligerents, and it is a compromise because, even if we could do so, we do not want to prevent even belligerents from getting food, medical supplies, and things like that. It is the best we can do.

NEUTRALITY MUST BE A CONGRESSIONAL POLICY

The fourth misconception has to do with what neutrality is. It means treating everyone alike. It means that we in Congress adopt a policy and program to accomplish that. It cannot mean that we say in our legislation to the President, "Now, you can do thus and so or not do it, as the circumstances seem to you to require."

It seems to me unfair and impossible to expect any President to keep us neutral if he is put in the position of deciding when to apply cash-and-carry and where, when to let submarines into our ports, or whether or not to let American ships carry materials of war. We in Congress have got to take some responsibility. We have got to stand for a program. If it does not work, we have got to change it. But do not let us pretend we are giving our people a neutral policy when all we are really doing is leaving everything up to the President after war has already begun.

AN IDEAL FOR AMERICA

So much for clearing up misconceptions. Now, let me state my position. I want America to have adequate national defense. I want her to protect the integrity of the American republics. But I do not want her to finance or supply any war any place. There are two reasons: One is that I want to keep our country at peace, and I think the absence of war profits and the prevention of a war boom is a necessary condition of doing that. The other reason is that I do not want my country to encourage war in any way. Rather, I want her to make it just as difficult as possible for war to be carried on anywhere in the world.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED

Now, I know all about the arguments on the other side. The best one of all has to do with cotton. People say, "If you cut down your trade, the cotton farmers will suffer." Well, they will. Because cotton is the one great American product of which we export a very large percentage. We cannot escape the real problem of cotton. Suppose in order to carry out our desire to keep peace we had to seriously curtail our cotton exports. What then?

Well, I suppose there are 2,500,000 cotton farmers in the Nation at the outside, because there are 6,800,000 farm operators, including owners and tenants, in the whole country. Now, do you realize that there are about $11,000,000,000 of unpaid war debts still owing to the United States? Forget the cost in human life, forget what America paid directly for the last war, forget the just payments of bonus and compensation and pensions to our veterans—just take unpaid war debts. And with just that part of the cost of the last war represented by unpaid war debts we could pay every cotton farmer in America $1,000 a year for 4 years, which is far, far more than he makes on the average today. That perhaps would be part of the cost of keeping the peace. It would be a just expense. It would be worth it 100 times over.

At this point I should like to insert in the RECORD a very brief article on this subject by Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, which appeared in the March issue of Forum Magazine, and which sets forth a plan for enabling America to keep the peace.

LOCKING THE GATE

By Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture

In the following statement I am writing, of course, in a personal capacity and I do not know whether these views are shared by my colleagues in this administration. Furthermore, these personal ideas spring from my close relation with agriculture. I have seen how war distorted the farmer's judgment as to prices of his products and of his land and how, ultimately, farmers pay a larger price for war than most other groups.

Absolute avoidance of participation in a European conflict can probably not be assured, short of complete isolation from Europe in trade and finance if such a war should occur. This would call for an immediate educational effort to contrast the problems arising from participation with those arising from complete nonparticipation.

These problems could be met—but only if we were willing to accept some peacetime equivalent of wartime Federal power to permit the expenditure of a small portion of the $40,000,000,000 it would cost to participate in a war. Given the requisite Federal legislation, along the lines adopted for agriculture and industry in the 1933 emergency, and a five- to ten-billion-dollar fund, it would be possible (1) to offset the loss of industrial exports without creating industrial unemployment by reducing the hours of work per week; (2) to develop domestic substitutes for those products we now import from Europe; (3) to expand domestic consumption of industrial and agricultural products now exported by developing new outlets and financing distribution to the needy and to other low-income groups; (4) to organize production-control programs coupled with storage programs for such commodities as cotton and wheat, thus creating the basis for an ever normal granary and a reasonable supply of both wheat and cotton available for Europe's needs during the reconstruction period after the war; (5) to engage in other activities aimed at taking care of temporary or permanent unemployed, organizing for new occupations, and proper use of leisure.

To me the heart of this whole effort is to prevent a war-trade boom. The heart of this effort was expressed in the National Democratic platform, which read in part:

We shall continue to observe a true neutrality in the disputes of others—to guard against being drawn by political commitments, international banking, or private trading into any war which may develop anywhere.

We are not—we cannot be if we really want peace—trying to pass an act that will only keep us out of war if it does not interfere with our trade to do so. If we want to be sure to protect our trade and profits, then we might as well quit trying to pass a neutrality or a peace measure. If America wants trade and profit more than peace, the whole effort is hopeless. For it is obvious that the war system cannot be broken even for one nation as fortunately situated as the United States without real sacrifices being made.

A DEFINITE CHOICE

We therefore must take our choice between unlimited trade and peace. We have to take steps to prevent our country being brought into a position where she has obligations to her own citizens or her customers which can only be discharged by entering a foreign war. If we are not willing to do that, then we ought honestly to say so and admit that we are willing to go to war again to protect trade and commerce. There will be cry enough to try to get us to do that.

Can it be that we have so soon forgotten how many people would like to have agreed with William Jennings Bryan in 1917, but felt they could not because the Lusitania had been sunk with Americans on board? Can it be that we are so short-sighted as not to see that our job is to prevent such incidents as the destruction of American lives or property in order that men like Bryan may next time get a hearing from the Nation before their position has been rendered untenable?

There are countless Members of this House who tell us they will never vote to send American boys across the seas to fight another war, though all of us are at one in our determination to defend our homeland. But if you would not send American boys across the seas to fight—as I would not—then to be consistent it is necessary for us to serve notice now that any trading by our citizens, or any travel by our citizens, or any shipping by our citizens which is carried on as war trade in a search for war profit is, so far as the United States Government is concerned, of entirely secondary importance to the protection of the lives of its citizens and the maintenance of peace.

And if you do not want an embargo on materials of war as well as munitions, if you do not want a cash-and-carry provision, then what is the alternative? Clearly it is to convoy cargoes across the sea, to send not only American merchantmen but also American men-of-war to Europe or Asia. And what will happen? Will international law protect them? No; we will be drawn into war, and the war will be overseas. And then we will be confronted with the choice of either voting to send American boys across the seas or else saying that we are going to back down from our high and mighty freedom-of-the-seas position. And you know and I know which the choice will be under such circumstances. American blood will be shed on foreign soil again. And so if we are to stick to our determination not to send Americans across the oceans to fight other people's wars, then we must be ready to cut American war boom trade to fit that determination.

THREE ESSENTIAL CHANGES

I believe the committee has made real progress. Were this not so vital a matter, and did I not feel so very deeply that here and now may be our last good opportunity to write into law an effective measure, I should make no suggestions at all. There are, however, three changes which I believe so essential if the legislation is to accomplish the purpose of preventing the war boom and drawing America through private trading into a war that I cannot but speak of them.

WE SHOULD EMBARGO ALL WAR MATERIALS

The first change which seems to me important has to do with the "articles or materials" which, under section 4 (a) of the McReynolds bill, the President has power to forbid American ships to carry. It has been my understanding that these articles and materials are placed in a separate section from the "commodities" in the cash-and-carry section, because it is desired to give the President power to specially restrict shipment of materials which either go directly into the manufacture of munitions or are used directly in the business of destruction itself. I think such articles and materials ought not merely to be banned from American ships, but ought to be embargoed altogether. My own bill describes them as "articles or materials used in the manufacture of arms, ammunition, and implements of war or in the conduct of war."

I agree that it is necessary to leave to the President the drawing up, adding to, and perhaps subtracting from this list. But once on the list, I believe, these materials, which are really in the same class as munitions, ought to be embargoed like munitions.

There would, of course, under these circumstances be every reason for the President not to include anything in the list except such articles and materials as he felt impelled to include. Certainly he would not include food or medical supplies, and my own bill specifically provides that he could not include them. But certainly he would include things which from time to time appeared to be essential to the conduct of actual warfare, the manufacture of airplanes, guns, poison gas, and the like.

Both the Pittman and McReynolds bills merely forbid American ships to carry these materials of war, and the McReynolds bill compels the President to decide when and where to forbid even that. I can see no reason for letting any ships carry them. We might as well do the same with munitions, which, obviously, would defeat the whole purpose of our legislation. No. If we allow these special war industries to blow themselves up like great balloons and to fatten by the sale of materials which go into direct war use, those great balloons will one day burst in our faces and we shall find them filled with poison gas.

The second of these changes is that we must have a mandatory cash-and-carry provision for commodities not embargoed either as munitions or materials of war. I know the objections to it, but I believe them nowhere near as weighty as the reasons why it should be included.

It is charged that with a cash-and-carry provision other nations will bring their naval vessels close to our shores to protect shipments of goods. But the question may well be asked whether anyone suggests that, if we do not have a cash-and-carry provision, we should convoy shipments of our goods to belligerents. If we do, we are on our way into war. If we do not, there will be exactly as much reason without cash and carry for a belligerent power to send its battleships close to our shores as there would be with cash and carry. The only difference is that in one case Americans would own the goods and in the other case they would not own them. In both cases the goods would be destined for a belligerent; and they would be as useful to the consignee and as dangerous to his enemy in one case as in the other; and if you say, "But belligerents will be afraid to sink ships with American goods on them for fear America will go to war in retaliation", then I reply that you have answered your own argument by admitting that, if Americans retain ownership of the goods, we put ourselves in a position where we are likely to be drawn into war at any moment. It would be no easy task for a nation to keep a large part of its navy off our coast. What would the enemy navy be doing meanwhile? What would be happening in their own home waters? Remember, in this very act it is provided that our ports may be closed to belligerent submarines and armed merchantmen, as well as battleships and cruisers. Remember, also, that from a practical standpoint the control of the seas will, in all probability be very quickly decided and conflicts in American waters are the remotest of possibilities. And what is to prevent our moving the so-called 3-mile limit farther out to sea?

Why does cash and carry need to be mandatory? Not because I lack faith in one of the greatest of all American Presidents—Mr. Roosevelt. Not because I lack faith in one of the greatest Secretaries of State we have ever had—Mr. Hull. No; I believe cash and carry must be mandatory; first, because Mr. Roosevelt will not always be President; second, because it is unfair and unjust to expect a President to carry the whole burden of imposing this restriction; and, third, because unless we now provide for mandatory cash and carry I am afraid it will never be invoked at all. Why do I believe this? Let us consider what would happen.

Suppose a war breaks out. At once our stock market booms. At once war orders pour in. If for even 1 week we go ahead on the old basis of filling these orders and protecting our goods bought on credit until they reach their destination, our President will find it virtually impossible to change this condition in the face of a public opinion mad with the thirst for war profit. No; it must be stopped before it starts—this protected war trade—or it will never be stopped at all.

Let me call the Members' attention to the fact that both the Senate bill and the McReynolds bill absolutely forbid lending of money or advancement of credit to belligerents. How then would they buy from us if not for cash? And if they are to pay cash on the other side of the ocean, why not on this side? Unless we enforce a cash-and-carry provision, unless we restrict sales of goods to belligerents who will pay for them when they get them, the strain on our prohibition against loans and credits will be tremendous.

And so I think unless we have mandatory cash and carry we will find it impossible to enforce the prohibition against loans and credits and our whole neutrality structure would collapse.

Section 2 (b) of the Pittman bill, a mandatory cash-and-carry measure, does not forbid American ships to carry ordinary peacetime commodities. All it says is that title to goods must pass to a foreigner before goods are shipped, and that no loss incurred by the owner of the vessel carrying the goods shall be made the basis of a claim by the United States. In other words, it says that American shipowners carry such goods to any belligerent at their own risk. How will this interfere with our shipping with Canada? The answer is very little. It is true the title to goods shipped to Canada would have to pass to a Canadian before the goods crossed the border. I do not believe this would apply to toilet articles or bicycles, nor that courts would construe a person to have exported goods to Canada if he took his pipe there or failed to cross the border naked. But even if "little Chester" could not take his bicycle to Canada without giving it to the boy he was going to visit, I would be willing to sacrifice little Chester's bicycle to the cause of American peace. Even with a cash-and-carry provision, does anyone seriously think our trade with Canada would be curtailed? Where would Canada go for her goods even if she did have to pay cash for them? Would she go to Greenland, Siberia, Austria, or where? Trade with Canada is based on her closeness to us. We will be just as close with a cash-and-carry provision. Of course, we would not sell to Canada the articles we had embargoed, but our trade in other commodities would go on almost as before.

THE WAR-MAKING POWER

Moreover, if the President is to be given discretionary power to apply cash and carry in some cases and against some belligerents and not against others, then our neutrality is a mockery and our bill is not a genuine effort in that direction. Moreover, such a provision does, in effect, surrender to the President the war-making power of Congress. I cannot see how giving him discretion in drawing up the list of materials of war does so, but I certainly do think that leaving it to him to decide when and where to invoke cash and carry would definitely give him the power to render war inevitable on one side or the other.

It is a matter of no small importance, however, that there will be without question greatly increased opportunities for trade with neutral nations—especially South America—in case of war elsewhere in the world. And in this way we can quite possibly largely compensate for the loss of trade elsewhere.

GIVE PRESIDENT POWER TO KEEP AMERICAN SHIPS OUT OF DANGER ZONE

The third change that I believe essential to make is the inclusion of a provision, omitted in both bills, which would empower the President to forbid the entry of American ships into the war zone, or certain parts of it, if he deems it necessary. Under both the Pittman and McReynolds bills American ships can carry goods which are not on the President's list of materials of war. This provision is in my bill and reads as follows:

RESTRICTION OF AMERICAN SHIPPING

SEC. 10. Whenever, during any war in which the United States is neutral, the President shall find that the maintenance of peace between the United States and foreign nations or the protection of the lives of American citizens would be promoted by prohibiting American vessels from traversing waters within the zone of belligerent operations, and shall so proclaim, it shall thereafter be unlawful for any American vessel to depart from any port or place which can be reached only by traversing those waters adjacent to a belligerent state which are within the zone of belligerent operations except in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President shall prescribe.

WHAT SHALL AMERICA DO FOR PEACE?

I hear some of my idealistic friends asking this vital question, "What, then, is America to do for world peace? Is not the policy you advocate a purely selfish one?" My answer is this: First, I admit I care a great deal more about my own country than I do about any other. I conceive my first duty in this matter is to keep America at peace. But I also believe America cannot only make a tremendous contribution to world peace but that in so doing she can make even more secure her own peace.

If war comes, America will be the world's largest neutral. I believe we can do great good by building up a bond of unity among neutral nations, by encouraging them as much as possible to isolate the war and help bring it to a speedy end. I think we can push our neutral trade. Remember, we are not talking about weakening our national defense—at least, I am not. But I do not believe we can reform the world.

We tried it out once or twice and failed. Neither do I believe we can pick out aggressor nations with very much assurance that we will be right or fair. If one boy has three loaves of bread and another none, and if the second boy is hungry, he may start a fight and be an "aggressor." So with nations.

But there is another and better way. We can set an example to the world, an example of a nation that means what it says about wanting to be a good neighbor. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] told us the other day that the first step to peace was the removal of friction between nations. I agree with him. And the main problem in the world lies in the unequal distribution of sources of food and raw materials and of markets. For this reason I believe a world economic conference would do more good than a world disarmament conference, and that America's contribution to world peace should be made not by trying to reform the world or pick out aggressor nations but rather by herself acting in a manner which if adopted by other nations would lead to peace. One way we can do this is by refusing to finance or supply or make money out of any war anywhere. And another way is by a sincere application of the good-neighbor policy enunciated by the President, which means that we will not interfere in the internal affairs of any other people.

This implies a certain cost and sacrifice. It involves getting our marines out of China. It involves giving the Philippine Islands what they want—free, full independence. It means getting our whole military establishment out of the Philippines. Yes; it involves facing up to the fact that it is as bad to cling to empire as it is to covet it. We have made a good start at this. It means being willing to carry on trade freely as Norway and many other practically unarmed nations have done instead of forcing it on the world. We have made a start at this, too. This good-neighbor policy means something else. It means that to some extent at least our own men of money would be dissuaded from moving businesses and money out of the United States to foreign nations, there to take advantage of cheap labor to undersell their own or other people's factories at home. This very process led to the moving of Britain's cotton trade to India and the aggravation of her unemployment problem at home.

FOR PEACE: LET US SACRIFICE AND SHARE A COMMON LOT

I can understand the abhorrence which some Members of the Senate expressed of an America growing fat on war profits, but taking no responsibility for the safety of goods leaving our shores. But I have no such picture in mind. My picture is not of an America growing fat while she avoids war. Mine is the picture of an America growing slender because of her sacrifice for the sake of peace. If we grow fat, as we did in the last war, we will go to war from the sheer shame of it. If we do our duty, however, and refuse to supply or finance war, though we lose money, and if we share the common lot together here at home, then perhaps there is hope for America, hope for peace here, and through America and peace, hope also for civilization.

Let us pass a mandatory cash-and-carry provision and an embargo on materials of war as we now have on munitions. Let us keep America at peace. Let us convince the people of the importance of their choice. The key to the whole matter will lie in our own public opinion. Our task is not only to pass an effective law but to show our people the difference between the sacrifice of some trade and war profits on the one hand and the wholesale disaster and destruction of human life on the other. They will make their choice if they have the facts before them.

With our eyes open, our defenses sure for our American homeland, deceived neither by the beautiful idealism of those who hope for peace at one bound nor by the blind fatalism of those who tell us it can never come, let us take those steps which America can now take for peace, let us remove our Nation from every imperialistic position, let us determine we will never seek to profit from war and human suffering again, and let us demonstrate that America means what she says when she declares it to be her policy to be a good neighbor and to renounce interference in the internal affairs of any other nation.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TEIGAN].

Mr. TEIGAN. Mr. Chairman, there is little doubt that every Member of this body is today in sympathy with the general plan of neutrality on the part of our country in the case of a foreign war.

The attempt to be neutral as to the quarrels of others is, however, not so easy in view of the fact that every normal human is apt to be sympathetic with one side or the other. It is but natural, indeed, that those of us who believe in democracy in our country should have a feeling of sympathy with those other nations of the earth who have established some measure of democracy. Thus it is that the overwhelming majority of the American people sympathize with the Spanish people in their present struggle against the forces of reaction and fascism.

BILL CONTAINS WEAKNESSES

The bill before us has several serious weaknesses, in my opinion. These have been discussed by other Members of the House, and will no doubt be discussed further by Members who have not yet spoken on the measure. I desire to discuss briefly section 5 of the bill, which would, in practical effect, prohibit associations and organizations of persons from raising funds and otherwise contributing to the aid of the victims of war. I cannot believe that Congress is going to place its sanction upon such a provision. The least that we, the members of American democracy, can do for our brethren in Spain is to give aid to those of their people who have fallen victims to an undeclared war upon them by the two large Fascist powers of Europe—Germany and Italy. Yet this would be forbidden by the provision referred to.

CONDUCT TOWARD SPAIN REPREHENSIBLE

Our conduct in reference to Spain has been, in my opinion, most reprehensible and contrary to the general practice of this country toward friendly governments. All aid to the Spanish people was cut off under the resolution adopted on the second day of the present session.

Let us take a look at this situation and justify it, if we can.

The Spanish civil war, so-called, is not such in actual fact. It is in reality a war between the forces of democracy, represented by the Spanish Government and its people on the one side, and the forces of fascism and nazi-ism, represented by the Governments of Italy and Germany on the other. There is not even any doubt as to this. There is every reason to believe that the revolt against the Spanish Government was initiated in the first instance by Hitler and Mussolini. Yet their Governments were not adversely affected by the embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war because they are not officially at war with the Government of Spain. There has been no official declaration of war by either Germany or Italy against the Spanish Republic.

FASCISTS FIGHT SPAIN

Observers from the war zone have time and again called attention to the fact that there were large forces of German and Italian soldiers, airplanes, and other military equipment in use on the side of the rebels. The New York Post, commenting upon the recent fall of the city of Malaga, stated:

> If the Fascists are victorious, there may be none left alive except Germans, Italians, and Moors to give the Fascist war cry "Up Spain."

Even the conservative Washington Post, on February 10, editorially corroborated the view expressed by the New York Post. I quote:

> The fall of Malaga is Mussolini's and Italy's war. The capture of Malaga is their victory, and in all probability the Fascist Spain they are seeking to establish will be their Spain.

DR. BETHUNE DESCRIBES FLIGHT

This so-called Spanish civil war is one of the cruelest in history. The recent fall of Malaga to the rebel forces and the flight of the population of that city to Almeria, 100 miles distant, forms the basis for one of the most tragic events of modern times.

On February 18 the Washington Evening Star published an Associated Press dispatch from Valencia, Spain, quoting Dr. Norman Bethune, of Montreal, head of the Spanish-American Blood Transfusion Institute, on the flight of 150,000 men, women, and children from Malaga, which he described as "the most terrible evacuation of a city in modern times."

A "TERRIBLE EVACUATION"

Dr. Bethune's statement in full reads as follows:

Imagine 150,000 men, women, and children setting out for safety to a town situated more than 100 miles away, with only one road to take, on a journey requiring 5 days and 5 nights at least.

There was no food to be found in the villages, and there were no trains or busses to transport them.

They staggered and stumbled, with cut and bruised feet, along the white flint road, while the Fascists (insurgents) bombed them from the air and from the sea.

There were thousands of children.

We counted at least 5,000 under 10 years of age, at least a thousand of them barefoot and many clad only in single garments.

The incessant stream of people became so dense we barely could force our cars through them.

We met so many distressed women and children we decided to turn back and start transporting the worst cases to safety.

But it was difficult to choose which to take.

Our car was besieged by a mob of frantic mothers and fathers who, with tired outstretched arms, held up to us their children, with their faces swollen and congested by 4 days of sun and dust.

How could we choose between a child dying of dysentery and a mother stolidly watching us with great sunken eyes carrying against her open breast her child born on the road 2 days before?

Many old people simply gave up the struggle and laid down beside the road to wait for death.

We first decided to take only children and mothers. Then the separation of fathers and children, husbands and wives became too cruel to bear. We finished by transporting to Almeria the families with the largest number of children and children without parents.

On the evening of the 12th, when the little seaport of Almeria was completely filled with refugees who thought they had reached a haven of safety, German and Italian airplanes dropped 10 bombs in the very center of town, where refugees were sleeping huddled so closely together on the main street that an auto could pass only with great difficulty.

After the planes passed I picked up three dead children from the pavement where they had been standing in line waiting for a cup of preserved milk and a handful of dry bread, the only food some of them had for days.

The street was a shambles of dead and dying, lighted only by the orange glare of burning buildings. In the semidarkness the moans of wounded children and the shrieks of agonized mothers rose in a massed cry higher and higher to a pitch of intolerable intensity.

FASCISTS MASSACRE REFUGEES AT ALMERIA

The massacre of the helpless refugees at Almeria seems all but unbelievable in these times. It merely shows to what extremes the Fascist monsters leading a wild mob of uncivilized Moors will do to the workers when the latter rise to throw off the yoke of economic and mental enslavement.

But the record would not be complete without reference to the part played by that much advertised angel of the battlefield—the International Red Cross. As in Russia during the counter revolution, the Red Cross has done nothing to aid the victims of capitalism's atrocities. "The Red Cross has done nothing about the belabored people of Spain," writes Ernest H. Hemmingway to the New York Post (Jan. 14, 1937). "We ought to have some service here. I have yet to hear about a Red Cross ambulance being seen in this war."

CONGRESS MUST AID HELPLESS VICTIMS

It is bad enough that Congress should have imposed its unjust embargo conditions upon the Spanish Government and its people, but to deny aid to the victims of the Spanish war itself seems contemptible. The least we can do as a nation boasting of our friendship for the cause of democracy is to permit persons interested in that cause to render medical and other aid to the helpless victims of an undeclared war by the pirate crews of Hitler and Mussolini. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of the time to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL of Washington. Mr. Chairman, one of the issues raised in this debate is freedom of the seas. To support this issue it is said that freedom of the seas is a more than century-old policy. Does age make a policy wise and sacred? We are living in a time of change, and I for one want to make a change for the better.

To the north of us is a friendly nation. To the south of us is a friendly nation. To the east of us is the Atlantic, separating us from Europe. To the west of us is the Pacific, separating us from Asia. We are safe within our own borders, but the moment we insist on freedom of the seas we are reaching out into all parts of the earth and are vulnerable to all attacks, and we must take the consequences.

It is my contention that if we insist on freedom of the seas we will get into another war as surely as we got into the World War. You need only remember the Lusitania. I admit that trying to protect the loans of our international bankers was also a factor in getting us into the World War, but the impelling cause was our insistence on freedom of the seas.

Mr. Chairman, they talk about being too proud to fight. I pray God we may some time be too sensible to fight.

Another gentleman says we must have a navy equal to the navies of England and of Japan. I say, let Great Britain and Japan follow their own courses. They have navies of aggression; we need one only for defense. All we need here is a navy large enough and airplanes sufficient to protect ourselves. I for one believe the American people will give millions for defense of their homes, but not one cent for war trade on the high seas, or for the purpose of protecting loans and property in other countries.

I am opposed to the discretionary power given to the President in section 4. It is too dangerous. I supported Woodrow Wilson in 1912, and I am proud I did so. I supported him again in 1916, and I was proud, because he said he kept us out of war. Just as soon as he was reelected he rushed into war.

The pathetic thing is that this great man went to Versailles and forgot his 14 points. He surrendered to European diplomats instead of standing on his own feet. This is discretion.

I supported Roosevelt in 1932. I was proud to do so. I supported him again in 1936, and I was proud to do so. He is for peace, it is true; but discretion, I repeat, is a dangerous power to give any man. He has said in his speeches recently that now is the time. Yes, now is the time to have mandatory neutrality. Now is the time to keep our heads and to have our feet on the ground and to decide this question once for all—shall we keep out of all wars in the future? [Applause.]

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON] cited several instances when Presidents had brought on war by indirect action—the sending of our Navy to foreign waters, and so forth. It is that kind of discretionary power in one man that I oppose. The Constitution gives power alone to Congress to declare war, and we should deny our Chief Executives thus to bring on by indirect action the terrible calamity of war. Rather let us enact a constitutional amendment to refer this matter of war to the people who must fight and pay the bill, except in actual invasion of our own country. Thus will we advance toward peace, the hope of humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PACE] such time as he may desire.

Mr. PACE. Mr. Chairman, I have been in my seat every minute since this question came before the House, beginning at 12 o'clock last Friday. I have listened to every argument and have been greatly benefited by the discussion.

My close attention has been prompted by the fact that I am deeply interested in the subject of peace. I want to contribute in any and every way I can toward insuring the neutral position of this Nation, and, aside from my personal views, I know that the people of this Nation want to remain free from the great conflict of arms which now seems to be rapidly approaching.

I want a peaceful nation, a people engaged in the pastimes, pleasures, and profits of peace, enjoying the comforts and contentment that come to one when assured that his or her fireside is safe from the horrors of war and secure from a call to arms.

War is a game that has never produced a winner. The victor in such a conflict may have defended a foreign investment or conquered a weaker adversary, but its own dead, wounded, destruction, and debt overbalance all gains that come from victory.

Civilization has not yet found a sure prevention of war. Racial hatreds, commercial rivalry, religious differences, personal aggrandizement and sordid selfishness produce such passions that the plans of the peaceful-minded are helpless against them.

But our failures in the past must not discourage or deter us from continued effort. Let us accept peace as our ideal and direct every effort toward that end, remembering that "our ideals are like the stars, we may not succeed in touching them with our hands, but like the seafaring man on the mother of waters, we choose them as our guide and, following them, reach our destiny."

And while we work for universal peace let us above all things else, in every possible way, strive to insure the peace of our own people, within our own shores, and keep them forever free from any conflict that may arise between other nations. To that end I believe certain things are necessary.

First, this Nation and those in authority should promote a spiritual revival over our land and embrace the teachings of the Prince of Peace. The doctrines and isms of other lands have now reached our shores and are attacking the very foundations of our Government. The people should be reminded, and we ourselves should remember, that "righteousness and truth exalteth a nation" and "blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord."

Secondly, and as we proceed in the fear of God, we should try to protect ourselves and should provide and maintain an adequate national defense. A navy the equal of any that ride the seas; an army sufficiently trained and equipped and of sufficient size to quickly prepare for the service whatever forces may become necessary in an emergency. We have the richest nation on earth; our fertile fields, our enormous natural resources, minerals, ores, and oils; our high standard of living; our great expanse of territory and over one-half of all the gold in the world, make us the object of envy, and in some instances of hatred, of every other nation on earth, and I believe it is most necessary for our peace and security that we maintain adequate national defense, so that the world may know that we are in position to defend ourselves in any emergency.

Third, as a step toward peace, we should take the profits out of war. Never again should we permit our manufacturers and munition makers to make millions out of war profits while our boys are serving in the trenches at a dollar per day. The disclosures before the Nye Investigating Committee of the Senate show that the selfish greed for profits contributed in a material way toward our entry in the World War, and we should now, in advance, put those who place personal gain above peace on notice that should this Nation ever go to war again it shall be conducted without private profit to anyone.

Fourth, I believe another necessary step toward peace is the adoption of the policy of universal service; that is, write it into the law now that upon a declaration of war, it will not be just our boys who must make the sacrifice, but every man, every dollar, every manufacturing plant, every munition factory, and every other resource of this Nation will pass into the service and contribute toward the early and victorious conclusion of the war. I believe that if we can let the selfish and profit pirates understand right now what will be expected and demanded of them it will put them to work for peace instead of seeking to promote international discord.

As a fifth step toward peace, it is my conviction that the time has come to close the door to all aliens and foreigners entering this country and to take immediate steps to deport every man and woman who has not accepted this as their homeland and sworn allegiance to our flag. Many fine people have come to our shores from other lands, they have accepted our customs and our form of government, have taken the oath of allegiance, and stand ready to defend this Nation in time of need; but there are millions of others who resent all authority, hold our laws in contempt, enjoy the privileges of our freedom, crowd our relief rolls, and all the while owe allegiance elsewhere and actively and openly solicit support for their native land. Not only is their presence a menace to the peace and security within our own borders but a constant threat to our international relations. Let us make America safe for Americans.

And in the same connection we should discourage and, if necessary, restrain the formation of different societies and groups whose sole object is to condemn or approve the authorities or form of government of other nations. We should deserve and demand the respect of all nations, and in return we should require our citizens to respect other nations. The groups which are now forming in this country are certainly not contributing toward a peaceful state.

And last, but by no means least, definite progress toward peace can be made by insuring the absolute and unconditional neutrality of this Nation, as among and between all other nations. We neither want nor need more lands; we neither want nor need more natural resources; we envy no nation nor covet their possessions. We neither suffer their hatreds nor have concern for their past defeats. We recognize their intrigue and understand their selfishness and insincerity. Let us tell them in plain and unmistakable language that if they must fight we shall have no part in it nor make any contribution toward it, but shall remain neutral and go about our own business.

That brings us to the resolution now under consideration. Does it contribute toward our neutrality?

The authors do not claim it is perfect; the State Department has not approved it in its entirety; I presume the President is waiting until the bill goes to conference before letting his wishes be known. But, in my limited knowledge of international affairs, I believe it is a step in the right direction, and I intend to support the resolution.

It prohibits the sale of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war to belligerents. It places with the President the control of other commodities useful in time of war. It prohibits American vessels from transporting arms, ammunitions, and implements of war to nations at war. It prevents American ports from serving as a base of supply for the ships of belligerent nations and prevents such ships from entering our territorial waters. It prohibits citizens of the United States from traveling on the vessels of nations at war. It requires the registration and attempts to control those who manufacture or deal in arms, munitions, and implements of war.

I believe that these provisions and prohibitions will help control and prevent the causes and conditions which lead to war and will contribute toward the neutrality of this Nation. Of course, it will largely depend upon the manner in which the act is executed by the President, and while this bill grants additional authority to the Chief Executive, he is already vested with the power to direct our foreign affairs and is Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. No one else is better fitted to execute this bill than the President, and I know that the present occupant of the White House hates war and is devoted to peace. We must trust to the people the election of future Presidents with the same high purposes and noble aims.

Mr. KLOEB. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY].

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, for 3 years we have been discussing neutrality and the American people have been brought into focus on this subject in a way that has never been equaled in our history. Seemingly, to my mind—and I have spent some time on this subject—had the facts of the World War presented today been known we would have kept out of that war.

I am vitally interested in the defeat of the Pittman bill, because I believe it is a possible violation of the greatest action we have ever taken—the spearhead for peace—the reciprocal-trade treaties of the State Department and of our administration. The gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] mentioned this this afternoon, and I was going to ask her at the time if she felt that while there might be some danger in the McReynolds bill, how infinitely much more danger there might be in the Pittman bill.

I know that under international law we have the right to abrogate a treaty any time we wish; but when we are dealing on a reciprocal basis we cannot abrogate and still retain friendship. I feel that the express wording of the McReynolds bill is the surest guaranty that these treaties will not be abrogated or broken in any way as pitted against the Pittman verbiage.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. Gladly.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman that the Pittman bill is infinitely worse in that respect, and also that it brings the war to our shores.

Mr. SHANLEY. I thank the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

I believe that not only the Buenos Aires treaties but the peace treaties are the spearheads.

Our President has certain power by the words of the Supreme Court, not because of the Curtiss case, but far back in the case of Marbury against Madison, Chief Justice Marshall said that the President of the United States when dealing in foreign affairs is responsible to nobody but his own conscience and his own discretion. He made the same speech in the House of Representatives some years before that. This wide territory that is covered by international relations is positive where it can only be positive in respect of the function of the President of the United States. If we attempt to take advantage of this wide discretion and place in there the mandate of the Pittman bill, which, to my mind, is nothing more than an international Frigidaire with the current turned off, we are going to place in that wide field a little power that may prove embarrassing to the interlocking interests of our President in international affairs. I am not worried about the President of the United States. I believe he has a mandate from the people of this country to fulfill, not only as to his social legislation, but with respect to his attitude toward foreign affairs.

I know of no man in modern history who has such a grasp of international affairs as the Chief Executive now in the White House, and I am willing to trust him. I do not know how far that trust would go in respect of his successors, but this man has got to have discretion. He has worked on a tripartite agreement, and he is working on a disarmament conference; and if it were not for the fact that social legislation right here in America is far more important, I might say to the gentleman who brought up the question today, he would be working on a greater disarmament conference than has ever been held in this country.

I believe, if you examine the thought of the fathers of this country, you will find that those men had a belief and a conviction with respect to some type of international law. International law is not dead, or why would every chancellery, every great newspaper have within its ranks men who know international law? There is not a single problem that arises today but what men have to go back to international law and examine the monumental volumes of Moore and the equally monumental volumes of Hyde, all of which bears witness to the fact that men and nations and governments and peoples must resort to international law.

Later in my talks I will authenticate this view by the remarks of one of our foremost international authorities, Professor Jessop, of Columbia. May I also say that there are two amendments with which I think the bill should be changed. One is a 2-year limit to admit of possible changes after 2 more years of study, and the other to make sure that humanitarian instincts are not violated by section V. I can say that Chairman McREYNOLDS has asked a subcommittee to bring in a change that will guarantee help here.

It is recorded in the Analects of Confucious that the master was once asked what was the most important requisite of government. He answered that they are: First, sufficiency of food; second, sufficiency of military equipment; third, confidence of the people in their ruler.

In response to successive questions as to which one of these three might be dispensed with, he replied, "Sufficiency of military equipment."

Faced with the natural query as to which of the remaining two, he countered with this reply:

> Part with food; from of old, death has been the lot of all men. But if the people have no faith in their rulers there is no standing for the state.

I have faith in our Executive; not only faith but a realizing sense, as the theologians say, of his preterhuman grasp of domestic and foreign affairs. I should rather trust him in today's affairs than any man I know or I have known. It is not a blind or purblind loyalty but a conviction tried on the ramparts of past experience. He is best equipped to carry us through the delicate, manifold, and complicated skein of international relations. Those three adjectives are from the Supreme Court, in Justice Sutherland's decision on the Curtiss case, and they describe what that tribunal thinks of the complexity of foreign affairs.

I am a realist. Perhaps in this instant legislation I am a surrealist. I know as well as you that this committee will adopt either the McReynolds or the Pittman bill. Negatively, I am most concerned in the repudiation of the theory and philosophy of the Senate bill, with its automatic mandates. Positively, I believe that the purpose of both is, of course, similar, in that both seek to keep us out of war and to maintain the peace of the world. Basically, I believe that our greatest contribution to the peace of the world is being hourly demonstrated in the furtherance of our reciprocal-trade treaties, the quick ratification of the pacts and philosophy of Buenos Aires and a recodification of the laws of nations that will especially renovate the doctrine of contraband and make it serviceable in a newer world.

I never think of the situation that confronted us in 1914 to 1917 without referring to the parallel of the early Christians. In the midst of a world dominated by the capricious rule of the Roman Empire this little band avoided contact with the Roman Empire and its governors. They abstained from the responsibilities of office holding and were reluctant to serve in the armed forces. Their thoughts were of another world, for they had little hope from the proud Caesars, who seemed too all-powerful to be resisted and too corrupt to be converted. In the words of another, they were fighting against "institutions, the work and pride of untold centuries of paganism, drawing their sanctions from the gods whom they counted devils." As a result they thought little of the duties of government. Instead they occupied themselves with the virtues and duties of subjects right down to the time of Chrysostom. They shrank from contemplating the burden of power in their beliefs. If they pondered upon the words of Christ, spoken on His last visit to the Temple, 3 days before His death, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's and unto God the things that are God's", they might have realized that that utterance gave a dignity to the civil power under the protection of conscience. In fact, they were the very protection of conscience; the repudiation of absolutism and the inauguration of freedom. Christ not only gave them the precept but the force to execute it, "To maintain the necessary immunity in one sphere, to reduce all political authority within the defined limits, ceased to be an aspiration of patient reasoners, but was made the perpetual charge and care of the most energetic institution and the most universal association in the world." It energized those sublime martyrs and made them realize that they had worldly duties to perform of transcendental importance.

Our country occupies a similar role. What we learned in the World War, and since, has convinced me that our reciprocal-trade treaties, our great and fruitful good-neighbor gestures at Buenos Aires, our future successful obtainment of a recodification of international law and a sensible agreement on "contraband", alone, will permit us to exert a force and a prestige with concerting nations that will force belligerents to consider the force of neutrals. We will be fulfilling a duty to all other neutrals to uphold the position of a neutral with the prestige and vigorous protests of a great people. Neutrals of the size of America, backed by the group which is concerned in over 50 percent of the world trade, may well exercise a potency that will be respected by belligerents.

There is a rapidly growing feeling in the world that belligerents have occupied too large a place in the furtherance of their martial ends. Too often they have simply shunted neutrals in a corner and by extension of contraband, paper blockades, violations of the rights of search and seizure, bunker and blacklists, trading trusts, and undue exploitation of the rights of asylum made the world a spawning ground for their bloody aims.

Under the pretense of protection of their own rights they have coveted and then stolen neutral trade.

In the World War, Holland alone had courage, diplomatic prestige, and persistency in successfully defending her rights in a world of terror and supineness.

A country like Norway, for example, which has had but 7 years of war since 1720, and during the 122 years not a single Norwegian soldier has had to fight, views these encroachments on neutral rights with pain and apprehension, for she, too, has her ships sailing the seven seas. She is but one of the many small nations today, too small individually, to enter a vigorous protest, but together might stop this smothering blanketing of the war gods.

Conceivably, under the League of Nations, there could be no such thing as neutrality, at least theoretically. How erroneous that hope is has become only too well known to all except to mention it now and dismiss it. Time and more propitious circumstances may revive it.

On every side there have been evidences of the bitterness of the small powers toward the large powers in the contemplated formation of a neutral nonmilitary block as a distinct counterweight to the major sovereigns. Irrespective of their actual size, these smaller nations do represent a feeling of opposition. Yes; they stand for more, as only last autumn, at the assembly of the League of Nations, they were forceful enough to uphold the principles of international justice, even though the major powers were opposed. It was a bloodless victory and not relished by those powers whose only hope is the maintenance of the status quo. Militantly and with evident ability these sovereignties will not see the great salutary principles of international law jettisoned by their selfish neighbors of size and magnitude.

Belgium is another instance of the determination of these smaller groups to be no longer pawns in the chessboard of the inner selfish concerts.

Thus in our recodification yearnings we have hopeful and willing support on the other side of the Atlantic.

It is a very enervating blow to the theory of collective action, for the smaller nations believe they see the camouflage which has permitted the larger nations using the collective security weapon as a shield for defensive alliances.

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, like thoughts of a virile peace-provoking philosophy once held this country in its grasp. We were not searching for alliance in those days but, on the contrary, were rather anxious to be left alone.

Let me quote to you what Benjamin Franklin once said and thought, and what Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, and President McKinley approved. First let me, however, tell you that from time immemorial trade has been the real avenue of hope to downtrodden and harassed peoples. The peoples of Assyria and Babylon, the Medes and the Persians, the ancient Egyptians, no less than 90 percent of whom were the abject slaves of their masters, found hope only in ultimate trade or emigration.

Even in the Middle Ages it was the Crusades which opened up trade with the Orient and taught the victims of the feudal system that there was another way of living than by serfdom. Discoveries, too, played their part in this equalization of the world's inequities. But trade brought out the benefits. It will give us a better world.

In Carlton Savage's preparation of the documents touching The Policy of the United States Toward Maritime Commerce in War, volume I, we find the following:

In letters of June 4 and 5, 1780, Franklin offered suggestions for improving the law of nations. Although he approved the principles of the Confederacy of neutral powers, he wishes, for the sake of humanity, that the law of nations might be further improved. He thought it should provide that even in time of war all those who were "employed in procuring subsistence for the species or in exchanging the necessaries or conveniences of life which are for the common benefit of mankind, such as husbandmen on their land, fishermen in their barks, and traders in unarmed vessels, should be permitted to continue their employment without interruption or molestation, and that nothing should be taken from them even when wanted by an enemy, except when a fair price was paid for the same." The statements of Franklin in these two letters contained the idea which made the treaty of 1785 between the United States and Prussia an unusual one in regard to commerce in time of war and marked the beginning of the development of the American principle of immunity of private property at sea.

The first formal presentation of unique American propositions regarding maritime trade was made by the commissioners to negotiate peace to be incorporated in the definitive treaty with Great Britain. Although these two propositions, made on June 1, 1783, were not accepted by Great Britain, they are of interest because of their later history. The first was a development of Franklin's idea for improving the law of nations, expressed in his letters of June 3 and 5, 1780. It provided that in case of war between the two countries "all merchants or traders with their unarmed vessels employed in commerce, exchanging the products of different places, and thereby rendering the necessaries, conveniences, and comforts of life more easy to obtain, and more general, shall be allowed to pass freely unmolested", and that neither nation should empower private armed vessels to destroy such ships or interrupt such commerce. The second proposition was a variation of the idea presented by John Adams in his letter of April 14, 1780. It provided that in case either nation was engaged in war with any other, arms, ammunition, and military stores of all kinds carried by the ships of subjects of one of the parties to enemies of the other should not be subject to confiscation but that ships carrying such goods could be detained and the military stores on them could be purchased by the captors at their full value.

The first American treaty made after the adoption of this plan was the Treaty of Prussia, signed September 10, 1785, by Franklin, Jefferson, and Adams. Article 12 provided that in case of war in which one of the parties was belligerent and the other a neutral, the vessels of the neutral party were to be permitted to "navigate freely to and from the ports and on the coast of the belligerent parties, free vessels making free goods."

Article 13 provided that "the merchandise heretofore called contraband, such as arms, ammunition, and military stores of every kind" could not be confiscated, but that the captor could purchase such merchandise by paying the owner its full value.

This Franklin offered suggestions for the improvement of the laws of nations. He even approved a confederacy of neutral powers, which is virtually what we wish in the recodification of international law, and more at point certainly is what the conference at Buenos Aires portends. He went further and said that even in time of war, we repeat, all those who were "employed in procuring the subsistence for the species, or in exchanging the necessaries or conveniences of life which are for the common benefit of mankind, such as husbandmen on their lands, fishermen in their barks, and traders in unarmed vessels", all should be permitted to continue their employment without interruption or molestation, and nothing should be taken by them, even when wanted by an enemy except at a fair price.

So sage and convincing were his thoughts and words that the treaty with Prussia and this country embodied his thoughts to the fullest, one of the noblest and least known monuments to neutral rights in all history.

The thoughts of Thomas Jefferson, realist and closest to Benjamin Franklin and Washington in common sense, had a similar philosophy. He stated that in our treaty with Prussia we had gone ahead of other nations by declaring that nothing should be contraband. In a letter to the French Minister he clarified the American position on the question whether the flag should cover the cargo. He said he believed it could not be doubted that by the general law of nations the goods of a friend were free and the goods found on an enemy in the vessel of a friend were lawful prize. In his own words:

Reason and usage have established that when two nations go to war, those who choose to live in peace retain their natural right to pursue their agriculture, manufactures, and other ordinary vocations; to carry the product of their industry, for exchange, to all nations, belligerent or neutral, as usual; to go and come freely without injury or molestation; and, in short, that the war among others shall be for them as if it did not exist. One restriction on their natural rights has been submitted to by nations at peace, that is to say, that of not furnishing to either party implements merely of war for the annoyance of the other nor anything whatever to a place blockaded by its enemy.

If any nation whatever has a right to shut up, to our produce, all the ports of the earth except her own and those of her friends, she may shut up these also, and so confine us within our own limits. No nation can subscribe to such pretensions; no nation can agree at the mere will or interest of another to have its peaceable industry suspended and its citizens reduced to idleness and want. The loss of our produce if destined for foreign markets, or that loss which would result from an arbitrary restraint of our markets, is a tax too serious for us to acquiesce in. It is not enough for a nation to say, "We and our friends will buy your produce." We have a right to answer that it suits us better to sell to their enemies as well as to their friends. Our ships do not go to France to return empty. They go to exchange the surplus of one produce which we can spare for surpluses of other kinds which they can spare and we want, which they can furnish on better terms and more to our mind than Great Britain or her friends.

This is a dilemma which Great Britain has no right to force upon us, and for which no pretext can be found in any part of our conduct. She may, indeed, feel the desire of starving an enemy nation, but she can have no right of doing it at our loss nor of making us the instruments of it.

The persons on board a vessel traversing the ocean, carrying with them the laws of their nation, have among themselves a jurisdiction, a police, not established by their individual will but by the authority of their nation, of whose territory their vessel still seems to compose a part so long as it does not enter the exclusive territory of another. No nation ever pretended a right to govern by their laws the ship of another nation navigating the ocean. By what law then can it enter that ship while in peaceable and orderly use of the common element? We recognize no natural precept for submission to such a right, and perceive no distinction between the movable and immovable jurisdiction of a friend which would authorize the entering the one and not the other to seize the property of an enemy.

It may be objected that this proves too much, as it proves you cannot enter the ship of a friend to search for contraband of war. But this is not proving too much. We believe the practice of seizing what is called contraband of war is an abusive practice, not founded in natural right. War between two nations cannot diminish the rights of the rest of the world remaining at peace. The doctrine that the rights of nations remaining quietly in the exercise of moral and social duties are to give way to the convenience of those who prefer plundering and murdering one another is a monstrous doctrine and ought to yield to the more rational law that the "wrong which two nations endeavor to inflict on each other must not infringe on the rights or conveniences of those remaining at peace." And what is "contraband" by the law of nature?

Either everything which may aid or comfort an enemy or nothing. Either all commerce which would accommodate him is unlawful or none is. The difference between articles of one or another description is a difference in degree only. No line between them can be drawn. Either all intercourse must cease between neutrals and belligerents or all be permitted. Can the world hesitate to say which shall be the rule? Shall two nations, turning tigers, break up in one instant the peaceable relations of the whole world? Reason and nature clearly pronounce that the neutral is to go on in the enjoyment of all its rights, that its commerce remains free, not subject to the jurisdiction of another * * *.

Although I consider the observance of these principles as of great importance to the interest of peaceable nations, among whom I hope the United States will ever place themselves, yet in the present state of things they are not worth a war. Nor do I believe war the most certain means of enforcing them. Those peaceable coercions which are in the power of every nation, if undertaken in concert and in time of peace, are more likely to produce the desired effect.

Over this great interest—our foreign commerce—in which not only our merchants but all classes of citizens, at least indirectly, are concerned, it is the duty of the executive and legislative branches of the Government to exercise a careful supervision and adopt proper measures for its protection. The policy which I had in view in regard to this interest embraces its future as well as its present security. Long experience has shown that, in general, when the principal powers of Europe are engaged in war the rights of neutral nations are endangered. This consideration led, in the progress of the war of our independence, to the formation of the celebrated confederacy of armed neutrality, a primary object of which was to assert the doctrine that free ships make free goods except in the case of articles contraband of war—a doctrine which from the very commencement of our national being has been a cherished idea of the statesmen of this country. At one period or another every maritime power has by some solemn treaty stipulation recognized that principle, and it might have been hoped that it would come to be universally received and respected as a rule of international law.

It adds to the complications arising out of the uncertainty in which this subject is involved, that there is no common tribunal empowered to decide between the independent parties when a belligerent nation interested in the measure undertakes to add a new article to the catalog of contraband, upon the assumption that it has changed its character from a peaceable to a warlike one in consequence of a change in the objects to which it may be applied, either by a revolution in the mode of conducting war or by improvements in the implements used in its prosecution. The pretensions of a prerogative on the part of sovereigns, whether in peace or war—if, indeed, such exist—to decide these questions, except so far as relates to their own subjects, are utterly repudiated by the United States.

All through these extracts we see the hope for a "common tribunal", a "confederacy of nations", and somehow a "league of neutrals." They are refreshing reminders of our needs of today.

Thus thought the great custodian of the rights of the common people, and thus he acted. Later days were to see the thought adopted by Adams, Pierce, McKinley, and Theodore Roosevelt.

One of the great chapters in diplomatic history is our effort to obtain the immunity of private property at sea. We, as an infant and new nation in the family of nations, though we never received recognition by the so-called great powers until after the Civil War, were but following out the principles of Hugo Grotius, whose book Mare Liberum, 1809, was the epochal writing on a fair field for all on the seas:

In gathering the materials of international law, Grotius had to go beyond national treaties and denominational interests for a principle embracing all mankind. From his time it became possible to make politics a matter of principle and of conscience, so that men and nations differing in all other things could live in peace together under the sanctions of a common law.

So spoke John Actor, and continued:

When Cumberland and Pufendorf unfolded the true significance of his doctrine, every settled authority, every triumphant interest recoiled aghast. None was willing to surrender advantages won by force or skill, because they might be in contradiction with not the Ten Commandments but with an unknown code, which Grotius himself had not attempted to draw up and touching which no two philosophers agreed. It was manifest that all persons who had learned that political science is an affair of conscience rather than of might or expediency must regard their adversaries as men without principle, that the controversy between them would perpetually involve morality, and could not be governed by the plea of good intentions, which softens down the asperities of religious strife. Nearly all the greatest men of the seventeenth century repudiated the innovation.

In the eighteenth century these ideas of Grotius, that there are certain political truths by which every state and every interest must stand, gathered potency. From his thought came the base for the Treaty of Westphalia, 1648, the peace of Utrecht, 1713, and even down to the congress of Vienna in 1815. The Westphalian peace gave legal recognition to the existence of many of the conditions set forth by Grotius as did the pact of Utrecht. In the latter the influence of the New World was observable with its mitigation of the severities of Old World diplomacy. While these three covenants of the mighty were but evidence of "the balance of power", they were helpful in resurrecting principles that have become epochal in educating the world to the necessity for freedom of trade and civilized intercourse.

In the later developments this country has played a great unselfish role. If we had not been gorgonized from head to foot by the stony and impertinent stare of the Allies in the early part of the World War, we might have carried neutrality to new heights. All we can say is that neutrality never had a real chance to function during that Great War, for our predisposition—ambassadorially, departmentally, and in divers other ways—prevented us from standing foursquare for the decencies of the laws of war.

Holland, on the contrary, brave, militant, sure of her rights, was the exact counterpart, and her refusal to allow allied merchantmen to enter her harbor stands out as one of the most glamorous achievements of small nations in the diplomatic history of the war and of the entire gamut of civilization.

In short, the World War saw us unprepared from a diplomatic point of view, from an enlightened, appreciative, public, commercial, and even military point of view, to exert that power which a great nation's prestige and insistence must always possess and will exercise in the future if we are to fulfill a manly destiny.

Let us revert to the great peacetime efforts of our administration in trade penetration.

In the great spearhead of our peacetime attack, the reciprocal-trade treaties, it would be well for us to study the mandatory section of the Pittman bill to test its purposes with the motives of the Hull efforts.

The patient, common-sense method of the Secretary of State to obtain new laterals in his bilateral trade pacts based on reciprocity and the unconditional most-favored-nation treatment have no counterpart in our history for modesty and absence of fanfare. The beloved Secretary, featuring the quiet, noble virtues of accommodation and conciliation, has labored slowly, painstakingly in the vanguard of what may be the greatest peace provocative in history. The immediate benefits are not to be large nor glamorous, and most headliners will pass by the quick, quiet, unobtrusive character of his work; but the Congress of the United States has probably understood, for he has 3 more years in which to effect results unhampered by logrolling and back-scratching sectionalists.

How will the future of this policy of Secretary Hull be aided or perhaps hindered by the following dogmatic, unyielding, and automatic section of the Pittman bill:

It shall be unlawful to export or transport to any belligerent country, or to any country wherein civil strife exists, named in said proclamation or proclamations issued under section 1 of this act, or to any other country for transshipment to, or for the use of, such belligerent country, or such country wherein civil strife exists, any articles or materials whatever until all right, title, and interest therein shall have been transferred to some foreign country, agency, institution, association, partnership, corporation, or national. The shipper of such articles or materials shall be required to file with the collector of the port from which the articles or materials are to be exported a declaration under oath that there exists in citizens of the United States no right, title, or interest in such articles or materials and to comply with such rules and regulations as shall be promulgated by the President. Any such declaration so filed shall be a conclusive estoppel against any claim of any citizen of the United States of right, title, or interest in such articles or materials. Insurance written by American underwriters on any articles or materials, the export of which is prohibited by this act or on articles or materials which are carried by a vessel or aircraft of the United States contrary to subsection (a) of this section shall not be deemed an American interest therein.

In the Honduras, Nicaragua, Guatemala, Sweden, Salvador, Costa Rica, and Switzerland reciprocal trade treaties these are the words used in anticipation of war or maybe—or may we not say in anticipation of neutrality?

Unless otherwise specifically provided in this agreement, the provisions thereof shall not be construed to apply to police or sanitary regulations; and nothing in this agreement shall be construed to prevent the adoption of measures prohibiting or restricting the exportation of gold or silver, or to prevent the adoption of such measures as the United States of America or the Republic of Honduras, respectively, may see fit with respect to the control of the export or sale for export of arms, munitions, or implements of war, and in exceptional circumstances of all other military supplies.

While in the Finland, Netherlands, France, and Canada the following:

Nothing in this agreement shall be construed to prevent the adoption of measures prohibiting or restricting the exportation or importation of gold or silver or to prevent the adoption of such measures as either Government may see fit with respect to the control of the export or sale for export of arms, ammunition, or implements of war, and in exceptional circumstances all other military supplies.

In the Colombia, Brazil, Haiti, Cuba, Panama, and Chile the slight change is manifest in these clauses:

ARTICLE XII. The United States of America and the Republic of Cuba retain the right to apply such measures as they respectively may see fit with respect to the control of the export or sale for export of arms, munitions, or implements of war, and in exceptional circumstances of other material needed in war.

Are the results of these clauses and the Pittman bill to be antagonistic?

Are the salutary hopes of Secretary Hull to be dashed by these automatic barriers?

Even if we must assume that all of these nations are high and contracting parties to their several pacts, are we to assume that they must have anticipated a situation such as the Pittman section above entails?

Even though they as neutrals are apparently meant, can they endure our past sufferances of the breaches of neutrality laws by greedy belligerents and still continue to make these pacts?

Will they have any respect for us in so running to cover?

Can they forget the insolent way that the Allies with England, as their talking point, treated our suggestions on the declaration of London, our weak protests to the council orders of August 20, 1914, and October 9, 1914, our supine acceptance of the third order in council, October 29, 1914, their detention of our ships, defenestration of the prior rules of maritime evidence, their illegal stoppages of mails, their bunker lists, and the countless violations which affected trade to the utmost?

Is it a swashbuckling brutal and ultimate usurpation of our trade?

Here is a point, Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, that too often is not stressed. When we talk of neutrality, we do not stress the fact that each belligerent has a right to expect that each neutral will fight for its rights with vigor and militancy and will not give up with weak protests.

Belligerents have a right to expect a neutral to do more than express "grave concern" or fear that a protested action may "awaken memories of controversies which it is the earnest desire of the United States to forget or to pass over in silence." In short, neutrals, especially those in the smaller power block, have an unquestioned right to demand that we as a neutral will stand on our own feet and not see our prestige and rights frittered away by a dilatory-insolent belligerent. They have a right to hope that departmental, official ambassadors, attachés, representatives of all kinds will be really neutral and not as Siegfried Sasson, the English war poet, so sardonically says in his poem, On Reading an Ambassador's Diary:

That is what diplomacy has left behind,
For after ages to peruse and find
What passed beneath your elegant silk hat.

You were a fine old gentleman; compact
Of shrewdness, charm, refinement, and finesse,
Impeccable in breeding, taste, and dress.

Guest of those infinitely privileged ones,
Whose lives are padded, petrified, and pleasant,
I can visualize you feeding off gold plate
And gossiping on grave affairs of state.

The visionless officialized fatuity,
That made, kept Europe safe for perpetuity.

Everyone wishes to keep out of war, but the Pittman bill before this House, from the other House, attempts to put us in a cyclone cellar by an embargo which insulates our wartime trade under an apparent "cash-and-carry" policy on every "article and material whatsoever" that is capable of exportation. Virtually, we face an economic tailspin at the outbreak of war by the Senate bill. To be sure, we allow our American vessels as well as foreign vessels to come and get whatever materials and articles they wish if not previously outlawed for transportation by the President but the risk entirely and dogmatically rests on the purchasers. There are no "ifs" and "buts", but an outright embargo on these commodities.

We not only abandon the "freedom of the seas" but we leave the seas free to the will, the whim, and the caprice of every belligerent vessel to perform on them the same vicious, contemptible practices that the Allies applied to our ships and to the ships of other prostrate neutrals during the World War. With all the smugness that characterizes a measure that is a "mockery, a delusion, and a snare", we not only take the profits but we make doubly sure that those who need the commodities most, when roused by an engulfing need, must be able to pay for them and will risk everything to get them. Maybe this is a sure way to shorten a war. If it is, we ought to close our eyes to every war in our history, when such a policy might well have sent us back to a Boston Tea Party status. The Greeks had a word for it, "sciamachy", or "fighting shadows."

With those sincere persons who believe that such a measure will aline us with the so-called masters of the seas, may I point out that while there is an apparent mastery of the seas in at least two occidental nations—I say apparent, because it is only surface mastery, and I might add possibly "superficial"—there are other masteries today under water and in the air.

Surface mastery in one or two or even three might well be neutralized as it almost was in the World War by undersea supremacy or even, as it may, by air supremacy. It would be well for those who are seeking surface combinations to check on the neutralizing supremacies that may well be dormant under and over the seas.

If we wish to aline ourselves with constitutional democracies and quasi-representative governments all over the world, and feel that we must fly to their defense at all times—if we wish to implement the Declaration of Independence, in a world sense—

> Whenever any form of government becomes destructive of the ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it and to institute a new government * * * when a long train of abuses and usurpations * * * for cutting off our trade with all parts of the world * * *—

Or are we to be the international keeper of all our struggling brothers in the world; if these are our purposes, the American people ought to know them and pass upon them.

It would seem a fair generality that the average man and woman in America wishes to keep out of war much in the same way that our fathers did in our struggling infant days at the turn of the nineteenth century.

Let us not forget, however, the brilliant mozaic of our President in the world panorama. Constructively, patiently, humanely, with a message of good-neighbor policy, he and his State and component departments are strengthening their greatest offensive for world peace by bringing into the combat area of their battle the surest weapons of peace that man has invented or stumbled upon—trade, honest and sincere. "As you sell, so shall you buy", as Frank Simonds says.

Widening and concentrating on world trade is a tremendous undertaking. Underlying it, however, is the hope that we can at all times serve our friends abroad with those articles that go to make up their more bountiful life. England, throughout the ages, has practically guaranteed that she will serve her customers, though within reason, in and out of war and peace, embargoes and blockades.

Latterly her peacetime supremacy has been challenged, for within a decade America has offered real competition, and even Japan has penetrated into the markets of the British Isles with her goods, while the Soviet Union has weathered the English blockade.

As the Chief Executive is engaged on this mozaic with flexible, easily moved parts, must he insert one that will be impossible of movement or insertion and prove a stumbling block? Will this homeless waif of mandatory section be like a solitary remaining cardboard piece in a puzzle, the leftover, the discordant note in the solution of the greater problem?

What about armaments? Can we look the world in the face and with one hand tell them to disarm and then make every neutrality move one that calls for the heaviest kind of armament on merchant ships in defiance of modern progress? Will it allow another mad race more consonant with the madman of Macedonia's polity than a twentieth century nation?

Was Walter Lippman right when he propounded the conundrum of the year in this fashion:

> In the case of a possible great war in the future nobody knows today, nobody in the Senate, nobody in any country anywhere, when it will break out. Nobody knows who will be fighting. Nobody knows who will be neutral. Nobody knows who will be allied with whom. Nobody knows whether it will be fought on the sea, in the air, or on land. Nobody can look into the future and predict the character of the war which Congress is to make laws about. How under these circumstances can any Senator either pretend that he knows enough, that he is sufficiently a prophet to write a law which fixes in advance the correct policy of the United States?
> It is well that we study with all the scrutiny and ability of our people the causes of the World War, not that we may keep out of that war, as someone has said facetiously, but as a basis for corrective changes.

It is perfectly easy for critics to say that these remarks constitute the grammar of prophetical ignorance on neutrality but none who has followed Lippman will admit the truth of that charge. He believes that there is not any great liklihood of a great war and that America's distance is her great enchantment. His extended views are emphatic enough to kill the charge of indifference by these same critics. It might be said, however, that like Pontius Pilate, who said what is truth, and then did not stay for an answer, that Walter has suggested the problem but not the response.

As a practical matter any risk transfer or any cash-and-carry system involve the very elements of international exchange. We are to sell our goods at tidewater and the foreign buyers would have to be there with hard cash, gold, or a practical equivalent. Our old clipper ships in days past would leave our shores with their holds full of pieces of eight with which to exchange for silks, satins, and other objects of demand on our littoral shores. Is not this what foreign buyers must do now under the Pittman bill?

Most students are willing to admit that the following correctives embodied in our present law are helpful, certainly not harmful. They are willing to approve them:

Provisions of Neutrality Resolution (RECORD, 74th Cong., 1st sess.):

1. Lays an embargo upon the outbreak of war on exports of arm, munitions, and implements of war to all belligerents.

2. Prohibits American ships from carrying arms or munitions under embargo to any belligerent port or to any neutral port for transshipment to belligerents.

3. Authorizes the President to prohibit travel by Americans on ships of belligerent nations except at their own risk.

4. Authorizes the President to restrict or prohibit the entry of belligerent submarines into American waters or ports.

5. Authorizes the President to restrict or prohibit the carrying of men or munitions from American ports for delivery to belligerent ships at sea.

6. Requires all manufacturers, exporters, and importers of munitions and implements of war to register with the Secretary of State, with provision for licensing of exports and imports. This section of the act will be administered by a national munitions control board, composed of the Secretary of State, as chairman, and the Secretaries of the Treasury, Navy, and War.

Renewal and strengthening of 1935 neutrality law, from Seventy-fourth Congress, second session, RECORD:

Two principal additions were made to the neutrality legislation of the first session. The first prohibits extensions of loans or credits to belligerents, excepting ordinary commercial credits and renewals of existing indebtedness. The second exempts nations of the Western Hemisphere from the provisions of the act when at war with non-American States. When we start these and then jump into additions we are in danger, but let me digress.

International law is not a dead issue. Prof. Phillip C. Jessup, of Columbia, points this out very definitely in a recent article:

> This is a not inconsiderable lay opinion—shared, unfortunately, by some members of the bar—that international law exists only in books. The persons who hold this view would admit that international law issues forth into real life when war breaks out, but only for the purpose of attending its own immediate and not too decent burial. Without attempting to argue the point at length, we might note that international law is enough of a reality in the affairs of nations to warrant the inclusion of large legal staffs in every foreign office. The opinions of the law officers of the Crown in England, delivered throughout more than two centuries, show that diplomatic proceedings in many important and complex international situations were based upon legal opinions as to whether the course of action planned was legally defensible. It is not daring to assert that in the present Spanish crisis Downing Street and the Quai d'Orsay have taken no step in the matters relating to blockades, arms shipments, recognition, and like matters without first studying the precedents of international law, or that these foreign offices are unique in this respect. What are some of the pertinent legal rules and precedents which all these legal advisers would amass and (one must in frankness add) interpret in support of policies considered desirable on other grounds?

I have said before that international law is not dead, but that it was held in abeyance by us in the World War, and with the single exception of Holland it was not militantly upheld. It seemed we thought it was like—

With useless endeavor
Forever, forever,
Is Sisyphus rolling
His stone up the mountain?

We virtually abandoned the distillations of tried convictions of international precedents in the alembic of 300 years.

In this adoption of a "caveat mercator" policy, as outlined in the Pittman bill hearings, are we not smugly retreating from the main problem, side-stepping as it were, and obtaining our profits by simply shifting the risk? Or is this answer following the line of the least resistance in a world of uncertainty and "confusion worse confounded"?

Because of this underlying influence, the subject matter of the Pittman bill is of the profoundest damage to the future foreign policy of this country. I have always been convinced that our embarkation upon additions or restrictions to the far-flung power of the inherent sovereign right of the President of the United States to deal with foreign problems should be attended by the utmost caution and the most searching of care and study. We must bracket ourselves between "ignorant change and ignorant opposition to change."

Two great teachers in Yale University, one in the law school and the other in the graduate school, gave me a stirring impetus for further knowledge in the field that we are now touching.

Prof. Edward M. Borchard, in International Law, and Prof. Charles Seymour, in the Genesis of the World War, both opened up fields of thought in their two great departments that have been of unusual assistance to me. For the first time, however, I have had an opportunity to again read deeply in their subjects supplementing their great contributions with the new developments that have followed since those happy days.

The field is tremendous. The minority report says that the subject would require the foresight of Washington and the wisdom of Solomon. I might add that it might well necessitate the patience of Job and the life of Methuselah. Obviously there is no organic law that can be labeled "international law" in the American constitutional sense. It is nearer the unwritten law of the English. Yet John Bassett Moore has seven and Charles Hyde two monumental volumes. Interlacing the legal angles are threaded the domains of diplomacy, national philosophies and policies, international currency, treaties, trade, bilateral and multilateral, disarmament and economic conferences, problems of immigration, and other phases too numerous to mention.

The field is so extensive that the Supreme Court of the United States has bracketed the entire field of constitutional decisions with the cases of Marbury against Madison and the latest Supreme Court cases, United States against Curtiss Wright, from Chief Justice Marshall to Chief Justice Hughes.

In the Curtiss case even stronger language is used to emphasize the tremendous powers that the Chief Executive has in foreign affairs. The Court says that, however much the power of the President may be circumscribed by the theory of delegated powers in internal affairs, there is no question but what he has the fullest amplitude of power in foreign affairs. I quote the very words of the Court to indicate their trenchant language.

Not only, as we have shown, is the Federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the powers is significantly limited. In this vast external realm with important complicated, delicate, and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the Nation. * * * Most competent to determine how, when, and upon what subjects * * * sole organ of the Federal Government in the field of international relations. * * * inquiry within the field of international law must accord often to the President a degree of discretion and freedom from statutory restriction which would not be admissible were domestic affairs alone involved. * * * he has the better opportunity of knowing conditions * * * confidential sources of information. He has agents in the form of diplomatic, consular, and other officials.

If more is needed, we quote:

As Marshall said in his great argument of March 7, 1800, in the House of Representatives, the President is the sole organ of the Nation in its external relations and its sole representative with foreign nations. He is responsible to his own conscience and discretion and the remote electoral vote.

The Court has truly said that the problem of foreign affairs is "complicated, delicate, and manifold." Under this solemn adjudication it behooves us to walk with circumspection when we attempt to carve out of that power chunks of Executive rights so that we may restrict them in the Pittman bill, an international Frigidaire with the current shut off. We have mandatory clauses today in the present legislation, but it concerns a bloody lethal business that none of us doubt needs the fullest of restraint. Even here, to say that the President's proclamation on any one date should continue frozen would be to deprive us of the necessary embargo upon improvements in arms, ammunition, and implements of war. The four new gasses deadlier and more devastating than any predecessor would be excluded—ethyliodacetate, brombenzylcyanide, diphenylchloroarsine, and diphenylcyanoarsine—any one of which would make phosgene and mustard gases of the World War seem like innocuous vapor.

Can we see the needs which may call for quick, critical acts in supercrucial situations as the President with wide powers? You say he has a power that may be abused and yield war. Well, study this extract from two well-known constitutional authorities and then remember that the most communistic of critics who could never be for war said that even the President must depend upon subordinates for information, so that there is little danger of his going awry and putting us into war single-handed:

This clause (article I, section 8, clause 11) expressly gives Congress power to declare war; but hostilities might exist without such a declaration. When we started the War of 1812 with Great Britain Congress formally declared war. The War with Mexico was started by Mexico because our President sent our Army into a region claimed by Mexico and then, after two battles had been fought, Congress passed an act recognizing "a state of war as existing by the act of the Republic of Mexico." We entered the World War April 6, 1917, by a joint resolution of Congress, signed by the President, which declared * * *.

Congress has power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, to appropriate money for the support of the same, and to declare war. The Senate may refuse to approve officers appointed by the President. The President may establish rules for the Army and Navy, provided they are not in conflict with legal rules enacted by Congress or contrary to international law as accepted by the United States judiciary. And the President, as Commander in Chief, has authority to direct the movement of the military and naval forces placed under his command.

Only Congress has authority to declare war, but the President may order troops or naval forces into foreign territory and thus bring on and wage war as long as Congress appropriates money therefor. President Polk sent the Army across the Nueces River into disputed territory and brought on war with Mexico. In 1900 President McKinley sent troops into China to protect the American legation and other American citizens against the Boxers. President Wilson sent troops into northern Mexico in pursuit of General Villa, the bandit; also to Veracruz when American sailors and flag were insulted at Tampico; and to Archangel and Siberia at the end of the World War in an effort to crush the Communist revolution. Presidents have sent marines to Cuba, Nicaragua, Santo Domingo, Haiti, and elsewhere in Latin America to protect American citizens or property or to prevent the intervention of other nations in violation of the Monroe Doctrine.

Powers in the United States in time of peace: In times of peace the President uses the Army and Navy to protect the States from invasion, domestic violence, and insurrection, and to guarantee them a republican form of government. To give examples, President Wilson sent divisions of the Regular Army and of the National Guard to the Mexican border to protect the border States against the disorders of the Mexican revolution. When the Pullman strike at Chicago interfered with the United States mails and with interstate commerce, President Cleveland sent "Regulars" to protect these Federal functions. When Federal functions are not involved and there is a strike involving local problems only, the President may send military aid into the State if requested by the legislature, or by the Governor if the legislature is not in session. When the Southern States seceded, President Lincoln sent armies of Regulars, State militia, volunteers, and draftees. When civil war threatened Rhode Island in 1842, the President was prepared to send Federal troops to guarantee the republican form of Government * * *.

As early as John Marshall, Presidential omnipotency in the negotiations of foreign matters was recognized. Here is an extract from Marbury v. Madison (U. S. Cranch, 1, 1803, p. 137):

By the Constitution of the United States the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion and is accountable only to his country in his political character and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority and in conformity with his orders.

In such cases their acts are his acts; and whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which Executive discretion may be used, still there exists, and can exist, no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political. They respect the Nation, not individual rights; and being intrusted to the Executive the decision of the Executive is conclusive. The application of this remark will be perceived by adverting to the act of Congress for establishing the department of foreign affairs. This officer, as his duties were prescribed by the act, is to conform precisely to the will of the President. He is the mere organ by whom that will is communicated. The acts of such an officer, as an officer, can never be examinable by the courts.

We must remember that belligerents are not only anxious to break down neutral trade, but they possess the thought of securing that trade for themselves. Our own Thomas Jefferson called attention to this secondary habit of greedy peace destroyers. A distinguished American has said that, "We know that in the World War one of the great belligerents, after protesting against our selling goods to neutrals, itself furnished to neutrals the goods which it had purchased from us." Nobody is going to see those articles of trade which are necessary for human comfort existence taken from us by a sly belligerent.

Are we to send our cargoes with risk shifted but not any protection for the ship itself? Suppose, as Senator BONE suggests, we can, under the Pittman bill send out a million-dollar cargo in a $6,000,000 bottom, with the risk shifted on our cargo but the ownership of the ship still in an American name? Is this not inconsistent?

Through it all winds the thread of executive problems. It is he who directs or supervises our economic penetration plans in the guise of reciprocal-trade pacts, our diplomatic bargaining, and our currency agreements. It is he who talks with foreign leaders like the Runcimans, the MacKenzie Kings, and the Bonnets.

After all, discretion is inherent in the office, for he has it as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, as a negotiator with foreign countries, as the representative of our Government in all international affairs, and as executor of our laws. It is difficult to see how remedies that must of their nature be experimental and temporary can be given such dogmatic benediction by their sponsors as to be so close to gospel truth as to become solemn, permanent, automatic, and mandatory law. These proponents of this knowledge must have forgotten the Baconian maxim: "Ab experientia ad axiomata, et ab axiomatibus ad nova inventa—for they will not start from experiment to axioms and then from axioms to new discoveries as he did, but they must reverse the process."

Senator GERRY has said that the result of our efforts to keep out of the war by the Pittman bill would be to wreck our entire shipping. Obviously if that happens to our trans-Atlantic shipping, it will not be long before it will happen to our coastal trade also, for if we yield in the slightest, the hungry maw of the war lord will seek new fields to conquer.

Senator THOMAS of Utah says:

We are dealing with an unknown. This sort of thing has not been attempted before. We are dealing with an unknown so far as the attempt to embargo or to transfer goods is concerned. We are dealing with an unknown so far as the changed ideas in regard to contraband are concerned. We are dealing with an unknown in regard to the rights of neutrals at sea, or even the rights of belligerents at sea. We are dealing with an unknown in regard to the progress which is being made in warfare itself. We are dealing with an unknown in regard to the various factors which will enter into the type of war we are going to have. We are dealing with an absolutely unknown in regard to one great arm of naval warfare now known as the airplane carrier, and the type of naval tactics it will carry on. Only once in the history of the world has an airplane carrier been used in actual warfare, and in that case it was used in a way that was completely out of harmony with any sort of standard that has ever been laid down for the proper conduct of belligerents in time of war.

Mr. President, that is my point, and this is why I have pointed out this one fact, to come back to what I was about to say. This cash-and-carry idea was thrust upon the world, I am pretty sure by a man who had had wide war experiences; a man who in his articles was trying to point out the inconsistencies of our neutral policy as proposed in 1935, and continued in 1936; a man who tells us in each of his articles that instead of this neutrality measure being an act to keep us out of war it is an act which, perhaps, will get us into war. Then he offers one simple suggestion, and that suggestion has been taken up—a suggestion which is no older than a year or a year and a half at most—and that suggestion is going to be written into the permanent law of our land and be a permanent neutral policy.

We are now about to pass a permanent act, and in that permanent act we are providing for an experiment which has never been tried.

Even Senator BORAH says:

If the President is dealing with a war situation and a crisis is at hand, I think the Commander in Chief, the man who has the direction of affairs must have a vast amount of discretion under a measure of this kind. If I should vote in favor of striking out this subdivision, it would not be because of the discretionary power; it would be because I am not in favor of our ships off the sea under those circumstances. Indeed, I am not in favor of taking them off the seas at all, so long as they carry goods and commodities other than arms, munitions, and implements of war.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. I yield.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman keeps repeating the statement that we are taking power away from the President. We are not taking power away from the President, this bill gives power to the President. I agree with everything else the gentleman says, but he repeated that two or three times. I do not think the gentleman meant quite that, for the bill does not take power away from the President, it gives him power.

Mr. SHANLEY. If I did not make myself clear, my intent was simply to emphasize that granting this discretionary power to the President was less dangerous in the world picture than hamstringing him with the Pittman bill. However, the President influences embargoes.

Mr. FISH. Oh, no; he does not. The President does not have the power to lay an embargo, for that is a power lodged in Congress.

Mr. SHANLEY. If the gentleman will refer back to his mentor and to mine, Prof. Edward Borchard, the gentleman will recall that in last year's hearing—in last year's hearing Mr. Borchard said that by international law we had unlimited power insofar as arms and ammunitions of war were concerned. I want to call particular attention to the word "ammunition", for throughout this discussion it has been used interchangeably with "munition." If the gentleman wants further citations, I refer him to the Curtis case and go back even as far as the case of Marbury against Madison. I think the difficulty is that we are using the word "ammunition" and "munition" interchangeably, for, of course, I do not mean to say that these bills do not give the President any new powers.

Mr. FISH. The President does not have the power to lay embargoes on commodities, because that is a constitutional power lodged in Congress.

Mr. SHANLEY. He has the power in the case of war ammunitions by international law.

Mr. FISH. That is right.

Mr. SHANLEY. But there is a different between "munitions" and "ammunition." Let us straighten that out.

Mr. FISH. That is right.

Mr. SHANLEY. And I would call attention to the fact that the word "munitions" has been used interchangeably with "ammunition." "Munitions" means raw materials, and "munitions" has been designated by the Wickersham Committee as being raw materials.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is giving us a very splendid discussion, but I take it from what the gentleman says, that this bill is innocuous, that it does not confer any power on the President which he does not already have. If this be true, then the only purpose in the McReynolds bill is to make the people of the country think that they are getting something which they are not getting. Am I right?

Mr. SHANLEY. By no means. The use of this power by the President will not interfere with the factors that he must constantly keep in mind in international matters, whether it be a tripartite currency problem, disarmament, or the acceptance or recognition of treaties.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman the balance of my time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHANLEY. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. This bill does give the President power to interfere with our shipping?

Mr. SHANLEY. At least his discretion must be exercised first. But much differently than the Pittman bill.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman this bill is better on the whole than the Pittman bill.

Mr. SHANLEY. Have I answered the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MICHENER. I listened very attentively to the gentleman's remarks. It occurred to me that the gentleman has impressed upon the House the fact this bill did nothing; that it simply reiterated a power which the President already had and if we enact the McReynolds bill we would do nothing to the power which the President had and, of course, was taking nothing away.

Mr. SHANLEY. I am glad the gentleman brought that up, because if he has so understood it, that was not my intention. Words are difficult to handle, as few people mean all they say and fewer still say all they mean.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman has handled the situation very well.

Mr. SHANLEY. May I say even if he has that power it is not a dangerous power to give him because in this international pattern he is the one that can decide whether it is to the advantage of America to use it or not. The use of the discretion is placed or deposited with him.

Mr. MICHENER. In time of war, of course, we all realize the President must have power, but in these days and in the light of modern doings, we should be very careful to lodge no more power with an Executive who seeks power all along the line. That is what I am afraid of.

Mr. SHANLEY. I can imagine why the gentleman makes that statement internally, because I know what his feelings are on internal matters, but externally we have the words of Justice Sutherland, who certainly is not a New Dealer, if I may use that expression. Externally in foreign relations the President of the United States is supreme. He has almost supernal power.

Whether or not that is right at some later day I may say something about it, but insofar as my experience is concerned on neutrality, in an attempt to bring a peace-loving people to its fulfillment, my belief is he ought to have all the power we can possibly give him in contrast to the Pittman bill. If I were sure, from my study that munitions were covered, and I think the distinguished orator from New York is interested in that——

Mr. SIROVICH. I would like to know the difference between munitions and ammunition.

Mr. SHANLEY. Ammunition has been defined as distinctly and dogmatically weapons of war, but munitions, by the report of the Attorney General, has been used to include raw materials. That is the danger in these treaties. They use military supplies and they use material for warlike purposes. The terms arms, ammunition, and implements of war cannot be interpreted to mean or comprise "raw materials." Munitions, on the other hand, has been interpreted by Attorneys General McReynolds and Gregory in 1913 and 1915 to include raw materials used in the manufacture of such weapons. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the joint resolution down to page 19, line 6.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WARREN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration Senate Joint Resolution 51, the neutrality bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Privileged resolution from the Committee on Ways and Means:

"House Resolution 158

"Resolved, That BEVERLY M. VINCENT, of Kentucky, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the standing committees of the House of Representatives on Claims and World War Veterans' Legislation."

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SNELL submits the following resolution:

"House Resolution 159

"Resolved, That FRANCIS H. CASE, of South Dakota, be, and he is hereby, elected a member of the Committee on Claims."

The resolution was agreed to.

ARMY DAY

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Concurrent Resolution 5 and its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 5

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That April 6 of each year be recognized by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America as Army Day, and that the President of the United States be requested, as Commander in Chief, to order military units throughout the United States to assist civic bodies in appropriate celebration to such extent as he may deem advisable; to issue a proclamation each year declaring April 6 as Army Day, and in such proclamations to invite the Governors of the various States to issue Army Day proclamations: Provided, That in the event April 6 falls on Sunday, the following Monday shall be recognized as Army Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from Alabama whether or not, in his opinion, this would give to the President of the United States the power to call out the National Guard in the various States to participate in the celebrations?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; absolutely not. I may say to the gentleman he has asked a good question. The only time that the President of the United States can call out the National Guard is when and after the Congress of the United States has declared war. The National Guard is a State organization. It is the State militia.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. This resolution would not have anything to do with that.

Mr. BOILEAU. The language of the bill is broad enough to cover the calling out of the militia, in my opinion. From the reading of the bill I gather it said, "All military organizations in the United States."

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It says, "Military units." But that would mean only military units under the President of the United States. As I stated, the President of the United States has no control or command over the National Guard except and until Congress shall declare war.

Mr. BOILEAU. By virtue of what authority does he then have that power?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. If we declare war, then by virtue of an act which the Congress has passed the President can call the National Guard into the Army of the United States, and when it is called into the Army of the United States, the President then, as Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, would have command over the National Guard.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate that, but do we, by this bill, give him the power to assert such control over the National Guard?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. Let me state to the gentleman that this is not a bill, this is a concurrent resolution which does not have the effect of law. This resolution only passes the House and Senate, and will not be signed by the President and will not become law. I think the gentleman need have no apprehension at all, that there is the least thing in here that could in any way be considered as giving the President any control over the National Guard of the United States.

Mr. BOILEAU. Relying entirely upon the representations of the gentleman, I shall not object.

Mr. HILL of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to know what the purpose of this resolution is.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The purpose of this resolution is simply to let the President of the United States in his discretion order military units to join with civilian, patriotic, and veterans' societies when they see fit to do so, in order to celebate this day, which, as the gentleman knows, is the anniversary of our entrance into the World War. I may say the resolution is inspired and sponsored by veterans' organizations.

Mr. HILL of Oklahoma. It just struck me as a little bit peculiar that we should spend several days considering some sort of a neutrality bill and then turn right around and adopt a resolution to parade our armies all over the country, just as if we were getting ready for a new war. It seems to me we have too many holidays already.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I may say to the gentleman this resolution does not provide for a holiday.

Mr. DONDERO. This resolution provides for an Army day, corresponding with Navy day, does it not?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. This follows the usual trend of all bills and grants some more discretion, does it not?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; it really does not grant any more discretion, because the President of the United States as Commander in Chief has control of the Army and Navy.

Mr. MICHENER. Then the bill does not mean anything.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; it does.

Mr. MICHENER. Either it does or it does not.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It means that the Congress expresses itself in the matter.

The resolution was concurred in.

COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the two special subcommittees of the Committee on the District of Columbia be permitted to sit during the remainder of the week while the House is in session.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana, Mr. GRAY of Indiana, and Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania asked and were given permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

BUSINESS AND ECONOMIC RESEARCH IN COLLEGIATE SCHOOLS OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Education be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4954) to aid business and economic research in connection with collegiate schools of business in the several State and Territorial universities and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LUECKE of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes on Friday next, after the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has concluded his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to inquire of the majority leader if he proposes to bring up any legislation tomorrow after the disposition of Calendar Wednesday business?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is not the intention. I may say to the gentleman it is my intention tomorrow, however, to ask that the House meet at 11 o'clock on Thursday, hoping to expedite the consideration of the neutrality bill.

Mr. FISH. I certainly hope the request is granted.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business from the Committee on the District of Columbia which would be in order on Monday, March 22, be in order on Monday, March 29.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SHEPPARD, for 3 days, on account of illness in his family.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED

Bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and, under the rule, referred as follows:

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 278. Joint resolution to make funds available to carry out the provisions of existing law authorizing the purchase and distribution of products of the fishing industry; with amendment (Rept. No. 391). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Under clause 2 of rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5552) to provide for the relinquishment of an easement granted to the United States by the Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co.; Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads discharged, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

A bill (H. R. 5218) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth H. Nichols; Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 3 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. McSWEENEY: A bill (H. R. 5681) to authorize the coinage of 50-cent pieces in commemoration of the centennial celebration of Cleveland, Ohio, to be known as the Great Lakes Exposition; to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. MAPES: A bill (H. R. 5682) to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon common carriers engaged in interstate commerce by railroad by requiring such carriers to maintain tracks, bridges, roadbed, and permanent structures for the support of way, trackage, and traffic in safe and suitable condition, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MILLARD: A bill (H. R. 5683) to regulate the practice of professional engineering, creating a registration board for professional engineers of the District of Columbia, defining its powers and duties, providing penalties, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5684) to provide for the completion of the 25-mile spacing of horizontal and vertical control surveys in the State of New York; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. VOORHIS: A bill (H. R. 5685) to facilitate the control of soil erosion and flood damage originating upon lands within the exterior boundaries of the Angeles National Forest in the State of California; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. CLARK of Idaho: A bill (H. R. 5686) conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render final judgment on any and all claims of whatsoever nature the Snake or Piute Indians or any band or group thereof may have against the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CELLER: A bill (H. R. 5687) to assure to certain aliens asylum within the United States; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. HOBBS: A bill (H. R. 5688) to amend section 905 of the Social Security Act; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HENDRICKS: A bill (H. R. 5689) to provide payments of pensions and increase of pensions to certain veterans, their widows and orphans; to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1937

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Lord of all the earth, whose love is ever great toward us, be very near and touch our hearts to thankfulness that for all Thy mercies we may bless Thy holy name.

Direct and prosper, we beseech Thee, the deliberations of the Congress to the advancement of Thy glory, the safety, honor, and welfare of the people of the United States, that our Nation may find the way of gladness and walk with Thee in the path of peace.

Remember those whose souls are straitened by sickness, sorrow, or despair, and do Thou consecrate to us the sacrament of suffering that we may share with Thee in lifting the burden of their pain until their unfettered souls, like fluttering birds, shall wing their flight up through the dark and find at last Thy shelter, the joy of Thy deathless love. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, March 15, 1937, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Megill, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills:

S. 361. An act to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N. Dak.;

RELIEF OF FRANK CHRISTY AND OTHERS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation for the relief of Frank Christy and other disbursing agents in the Indian Service, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

LEASING OF LANDS ON INDIAN IRRIGATION PROJECTS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to grant concessions on reservoir sites and other lands in connection with Federal Indian irrigation projects wholly or partly Indian and to lease the lands in such reserves for agricultural, grazing, and other purposes, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Senate of the State of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Resolution endorsing the proposed construction of the Red River Dam and Reservoir, south of Durant, Okla.

Whereas the United States of America is considering the construction of a large reservoir and dam on the Red River below the mouth of the Washita River for the purpose of impounding a large supply of water; and

Whereas the construction of said dam will greatly benefit the State of Oklahoma in that thousands of workmen will be employed and great sums of money spent in the State of Oklahoma by the Federal Government; and

Whereas the said dam and reservoir will be of great benefit in flood control; and

Whereas the construction of said dam and reservoir may be the means of furnishing cheap electric power to the needy citizens of a great area: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Sixteenth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma:

SECTION 1. That it does hereby express its full and complete approval of the proposed construction of said reservoir and dam; and

SEC. 2. That it hereby respectfully requests the Chief Executive of the State of Oklahoma and the entire national congressional delegation from the State of Oklahoma to do all in their power to cooperate with the national authorities and the authorities of surrounding States in bringing about the construction of said dam; and be it further

SEC. 3. Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, directed to send certified copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Governor of the State of Oklahoma, each of the United States Senators and Congressmen from Oklahoma, the Chief Engineer of the United States Army, the Mississippi River Commission at Vicksburg, Miss., and the National Water Resources Committee at Washington, D. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

To the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States; the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Washington, in legislative session assembled, most respectfully represent and petition the President of the United States and the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States as follows:

Whereas the President of the United States has recommended to Congress the enactment of legislation, urgently needed but long delayed, concerning the retirement and appointment of Justices of the Supreme Court and specific reforms in our entire Federal judicial system; and

Whereas your memorialists wholeheartedly and unqualifiedly approve and endorse the recommendations of the President and commend him for his constructive and forward-looking analysis of these much-needed reforms in our courts and judicial systems: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the State of Washington in legislative session assembled, That we urge upon the National Congress to enact the proper and necessary laws to put into effect the recommendations of the President contained in his message of February 1937.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Nevada, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Assembly joint resolution petitioning the Congress of the United States to enact a Federal law to eliminate competitive bidding on star mail routes and to provide for the retention in the service of star-route contractors giving satisfactory service and authorizing the Postmaster General to grant additional compensation where rates of pay are unreasonably low

Whereas the present system of competitive bidding tends to bring into the service inexperienced carriers, which results in inferior service; and

Whereas the fear of losing the contract every 4 years causes the contractor to refrain from purchasing proper equipment; and

Whereas the present economic stress has forced contractors to bid below cost of operation rather than apply for Federal relief; and

Whereas patrons on star mail routes are entitled to the same class of service as is given to patrons on routes where tenure and pay are fixed: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Assembly of the Senate of the State of Nevada, That the Seventy-fifth Congress of the United States be requested to enact such legislation as is necessary to retain in the star mail service experienced, satisfactory contractors and authorize the Postmaster General to grant pay adjustments at his discretion; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to each of our Senators, and to our Representative in Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of New Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

Joint memorial to the Congress of the United States, asking for the allotment of public lands due the Museum of New Mexico

Whereas in the statehood bill of June 20, 1910, under which the Territory of New Mexico was admitted to the Union, the Museum of New Mexico, established by act of the legislature of February 19, 1909, did not receive the grant of public lands allotted to all other State institutions; and

Whereas on this omission being brought to the attention of the framers of the statehood bill, with request that it be amended to correct this omission, New Mexico's Delegate in Congress asked that the proposed amendment be withheld so as not to delay the enactment of the bill and gave positive assurance that the oversight would be remedied immediately by act of Congress, which assurance was never made good; and

Whereas the withholding of said public lands from the State Museum has for 25 years deprived the institution and the State of revenues that would have been used for the protection and preservation of the historic and prehistoric monuments of New Mexico, and for the collection, housing, and display of its antiquities, which has resulted in continual loss to the State and the Nation of these valuable assets; and

Whereas further losses of this kind can be averted by correcting the manifest injustice to the State and to one of its indispensable institutions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Congress of the United States is hereby petitioned to direct immediately that from the unapportioned public land in the State of New Mexico an allotment of 500,000 acres be made to the State Museum for the purposes above mentioned, said acreage to be selected in the manner prescribed for the selection of public lands for the benefit of the other institutions of the State; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial be sent to the Senators and Representative of New Mexico and to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of the Congress of the United States, with request for early affirmative action upon the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by Florida Council, No. 41, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Jacksonville, Fla., favoring the enactment of certain pending legislation introduced by Senator REYNOLDS and Representative STARNES providing for the restriction of immigration, the prompt deportation of habitual criminal and other undesirable aliens, the registration of aliens, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also laid before the Senate a petition (forwarded by Martin Luther Thomas, of the Christian American Crusade, Los Angeles, Calif.) of sundry citizens of the State of North Dakota praying that no law be enacted that would disturb or abridge religious rights and privileges, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Inter-Professional Association (IPA), of Boston, Mass.; the Seattle Scandinavian-American Democratic Club; Local No. 1013, American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees; and the Liga Defensora de Mayaguez, Mayaguez, Puerto Rico, favoring the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate letters in the nature of petitions from George H. Rycraw, past commander, on behalf of James Reese Europe Post, No. 5, the American Legion, and Ernest F. Barber, vice president, etc., on behalf of Lodge No. 20, American Federation of Government Employees, both of Washington, D. C., praying for the confirmation of the nomination of William H. Hastie, of the District of Columbia, to be judge for the district court of the Virgin Islands, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Louisiana Society, Sons of the American Revolution, and Spirit of '76 Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, New Orleans, La., favoring the enactment of the so-called Overton bill, being the bill (S. 1790) authorizing the erection of a monument commemorating Zachary Taylor, which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the annual reunion of the Association of Veterans of the Revolution (under the Presidency of Gen. Emilio Aguinaldo), Manila, P. I., favoring the prompt enactment of legislation granting complete independence to the Philippine Islands, and also favoring the negotiation of a trade treaty between the United States and the Philippines, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the Stoneham League for Peace Action, in the State of Massachusetts, protesting against the enactment of legislation providing industrial mobilization in times of war or national emergency, and favoring continuance of the trade-agreement policies of the Government, and also the calling of an international economic conference relative to the stabilization of currencies and access to raw materials and markets, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. GIBSON presented memorials of several citizens of Cambridge and Norwich, Vt., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to reorganize the judicial branch of the Government, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of several citizens of Bellows Falls and Brattleboro, Vt., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to enlarge the membership of the Supreme Court, or any other legislation of a similar character, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SCHWARTZ presented the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Joint memorial memorializing Congress to support legislation now before Congress providing for the establishment of a system of Federal financial benefits enabling the several States of the Union to make more adequate provision for the control and the eradication of noxious weeds; to conserve and protect the agricultural resources of the several States and the United States

Whereas H. R. 4009, now before the United States Congress, providing for the establishment of a system of Federal benefit, enabling the several States to make more adequate provisions for the control and the eradication of noxious weeds; and

Whereas the noxious weed problem is too large for Wyoming, her counties, and individuals to financially cope with; and

Whereas large areas of public domain, other federally owned lands, and other publicly owned lands are involved in the noxious-weed infestations within the State: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Twenty-fourth Legislature of the State of Wyoming (the senate concurring), That we hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to enact into law H. R. 4009, providing adequate Federal financial aid for the control and the eradication of noxious weeds in the several States of the Union; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this memorial be sent to the President of the United States Senate and the Speaker of the National House of Representatives and to United States Senators JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY and HARRY H. SCHWARTZ and to Congressman PAUL R. GREEVER.

Mr. McADOO presented the following house resolution of the Assembly of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Whereas the President of the United States has proposed to Congress a sound, workable, practicable plan to increase the efficiency of the Federal courts, expedite the business thereof, and to promote thereby the dispensation of justice to the people of the United States; and

Whereas the pressure of litigation and the number of cases pending before the Supreme Court and the circuit courts of appeal and the district courts require additional judicial officers of such cases; and

Whereas certain of the incumbent Judges and Justices are of such advanced age that they should be assisted or replaced by younger Judges; and

Whereas superannuated Judges have a tendency to be "tenacious of the appearance of adequacy"; and

Whereas a retirement pension system for superannuated Judges has long been recognized as necessary; and

Whereas the Legislature of the State of California has before it this session and is expected to consider favorably bills to retire aged State judges and for the involuntary retirement of judges who become physically or mentally unable to perform their duties; and

Whereas the President's proposal seeks to expedite justice and to insure speedy decisions on important public measures: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly of the State of California, That the President's judicial reform program is hereby emphatically endorsed and approved; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives in the United States Congress from the State of California.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

SAFETY IN THE AIR—SUPPLEMENTARY REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE (S. REPT. NO. 185)

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I present this morning two very important reports from the Committee on Commerce. First, I submit a supplementary report relating to safety in the air. It will be recalled that the Committee on Commerce, or a subcommittee thereof, was appointed, pursuant to Senate Resolution 146, Seventy-fourth Congress, to investigate the Cutting accident. A report from the committee was submitted last June. I now submit a supplementary report in connection with the same subject.

"MORRO CASTLE" AND "MOHAWK" INVESTIGATIONS (S. REPT. NO. 184)

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I submit a further report. A subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce was also appointed, pursuant to Senate Resolution 7, Seventy-fourth Congress, to investigate the Morro Castle and Mohawk disasters. On behalf of the committee I am submitting this morning a preliminary report showing the recommendations of the committee regarding the structure of ships.

I should like to say, in connection with this report, that under the chairmanship of Admiral Rock, of the Technical Committee, there has been worked out a set of rules for ship construction which has attracted world-wide attention. For example, one of the architects of the new sister ship to the Queen Mary wrote asking for a copy of this report in order that the new ship might be made safe, saying that it was understood this report was an exhaustive one and the most complete ever made. It is very heartening to think that at least we know how to build ships in this country, even if we do not build any. So, on the part of the committee, I submit this report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports submitted by the Senator from New York will be received and printed.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask consent to introduce a bill, for appropriate reference, to carry out the provisions of the report just submitted by me relative to the promotion of safety at sea.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be now received and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

(See Senate bill 1916, introduced today by Mr. COPELAND, under the appropriate heading.)

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on March 11, 1937, that committee presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 936) to regulate the sales of goods in the District of Columbia.

CLERK, DISBURSING OFFICE

Mr. TYDINGS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 94), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That Resolution No. 208, agreed to May 12, 1932, authorizing the Secretary of the Senate to employ a clerk for service in the disbursing office, hereby is amended by striking out "$2,220 per annum" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,400 per annum."

ANNA BAUMGARTNER

Mr. NEELY submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 95), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1936, to Anna Baumgartner, widow of Gottlieb Baumgartner, late an employee of the Senate under supervision of the Committee on Rules, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

CREATION OF THE SENATE

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate a study recently prepared by Dr. George J. Schulz, Director of the Legislative Reference Service, on the creation of the Senate. It is based upon the proceedings in the Constitutional Convention of 1787, which created our present form of government, and since it deals with the creation of this body, I think it most appropriate that it be printed as a Senate document. I submit it for reference to the Committee on Printing, with a view to its publication as a Senate document.

I take this opportunity to commend Dr. Schulz for his efficient conduct of the Legislative Reference Service since he has been its Director. Many Senators know Dr. Schulz personally, more especially in his recent capacity as Director of the Legislative Reference Service. Most of us, I am sure, call upon him frequently for assistance, which is rendered efficiently, courteously, and expeditiously. I am convinced the Senate generally has come more and more to appreciate the value of the Legislative Reference Service since Dr. Schulz has been the Director thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the document will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

[Mr. HOLT asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD a radio address delivered on Mar. 7, 1937, by Raymond Moley, editor of News Week, relative to the reorganization of the Federal judiciary, which appears in the Appendix.]

TRIBUTE TO POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

[Mr. BARKLEY asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial entitled "Farley Tribute", published in the Middlesboro (Ky.) Daily News of Feb. 16, 1937, which appears in the Appendix.]

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed. The calendar under rule VIII is in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 4720, being the bill making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that it be read for amendment, and that the amendments of the committee be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made. The clerk will state the first amendment reported by the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Title I—Treasury Department—Miscellaneous and contingent expenses, Treasury Department", on page 7, line 17, after the word "for" and the semicolon, to strike out "$170,000" and insert "$185,000", so as to read:

For miscellaneous and contingent expenses of the office of the Secretary and the bureaus and offices of the Department, including operating expenses of the Treasury, Treasury Annex, Auditors' and Liberty Loan Buildings; newspaper clippings, financial journals, books of reference, law books, technical and scientific books, newspapers, and periodicals, expenses incurred in completing imperfect series, library cards, supplies, and all other necessary expenses connected with the library; not exceeding $5,000 for traveling expenses, including the payment of actual transportation and subsistence expenses to any person whom the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time invite to the city of Washington or elsewhere for conference and advisory purposes in furthering the work of the Department; freight, expressage, telegraph and telephone service; purchase and exchange of motor trucks and maintenance and repair of motor trucks and three passenger automobiles (one for the Secretary of the Treasury and two for general use of the Department), all to be used for official purposes only; file holders and cases; fuel oils, grease, and heating supplies and equipment; gas and electricity for lighting, heating, and power purposes, including material, fixtures, and equipment therefor; purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriters and labor-saving machines and equipment and supplies for same; floor covering and repairs thereto; furniture and office equipment, including supplies therefor and repairs thereto; awnings, window shades, and fixtures; cleaning supplies and equipment; drafting equipment; ammonia for ice plant; flags; hand trucks, ladders; miscellaneous hardware; streetcar fares not exceeding $500; thermometers; lavatory equipment and supplies; tools and sharpening same; laundry service; laboratory supplies and equipment; removal of rubbish; postage; uniforms for Treasury guards not exceeding $1,200; custody, care, protection, and expenses of sales of lands and other property of the United States, acquired and held under sections 3749 and 3750 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 40, secs. 301, 302); the examination of titles, recording of deeds, advertising, and auctioneers' fees in connection therewith; and other absolutely necessary articles, supplies, and equipment not otherwise provided for; $185,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 11, after the word "acts", to strike out "$46,000" and insert "$55,000", so as to read:

For supplies and materials, communications service, traveling expenses, equipment, and miscellaneous expenses in connection with carrying out the provisions of the Emergency Banking Act, approved March 9, 1933, the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and any Executive orders, proclamations, and regulations issued under such acts, $55,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits", on page 9, line 15, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$1,420,000" and insert "$1,435,000", so as to read:

Division of Disbursement, salaries and expenses: For personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, stationery, travel, rental of equipment, and all other necessary miscellaneous and contingent expenses, $1,435,000.

Salaries and expenses: For collecting the revenue from customs, for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, and not to exceed $100,000 for the securing of evidence of violations of the customs laws; for expenses of transportation and transfer of customs receipts from points where there are no Government depositories; not to exceed $84,500 for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., title 5, sec. 118a), but not to exceed $1,700 for any one person; not to exceed $5,000 for the hire of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; not to exceed $500 for subscriptions to newspapers; not to exceed $1,500 for improving, repairing, maintaining, or preserving buildings, inspection stations, office quarters, including living quarters for officers, sheds, and sites along the Canadian and Mexican borders acquired under authority of the act of June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., title 19, sec. 69); and including the purchase (not to exceed $87,500), exchange, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles when necessary for official use in field work; $20,650,000, of which such amount as may be necessary shall be available for the payment of extra compensation earned by customs officers or employees for overtime services, at the expense of the parties in interest, in accordance with the provisions of section 5 of the act approved February 13, 1911, as amended by the act approved February 7, 1920, and section 451 of the Tariff Act, 1930 (U. S. C., title 19, secs. 261, 267, and 1451).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 9, after the word "and", to strike out "459,180" and insert "$473,120", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the receipts from such parties in interest for such overtime services shall be deposited as a refund to the appropriation from which such overtime compensation is paid, in accordance with the provisions of section 524 of the Tariff Act of 1930 (U. S. C., title 19, sec. 1524); for the cost of seizure, storage, and disposition of any merchandise, vehicle and team, automobile, boat, air or water craft, or any other conveyance seized under the provisions of the customs laws, for the purchase of arms, ammunition, and accessories, and $473,120 shall be available for personal services in the District of Columbia exclusive of 10 persons from the field force authorized to be detailed under section 525 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Comptroller of the Currency", on page 17, line 4, to strike out "$45,000" and insert "$55,300", so as to read:

Suppressing counterfeiting and other crimes: For expenses incurred under the authority or with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury in detecting, arresting, and delivering into the custody of the United States marshal having jurisdiction dealers and pretended dealers in counterfeit money and persons engaged in counterfeiting, forging, and altering United States notes, bonds, national-bank notes, Federal Reserve notes, Federal Reserve bank notes, and other obligations and securities of the United States and of foreign governments, as well as the coins of the United States and of foreign governments, and other crimes against the laws of the United States relating to the Treasury Department and the several branches of the public service under its control; purchase (not to exceed $25,000), exchange, hire, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles when necessary; purchase of arms and ammunition; traveling expenses; and for no other purpose whatsoever, except in the performance of other duties specifically authorized by law, and in the protection of the person of the President and the members of his immediate family and of the person chosen to be President of the United States, $850,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public Health Service", on page 38, line 1, after the word "work", to strike out "$1,600,000, of which not to exceed $50,000 shall be available for investigations to determine the possibly harmful effects on human beings of spray insecticides on fruits and vegetables" and insert "$1,550,000", so as to read:

Diseases and sanitation investigations: For carrying out the provisions of section 603 of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935, and section 1 of the act of August 14, 1912, including rent and personnel and other services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere and items otherwise properly chargeable to the appropriations for printing and binding, stationery, and miscellaneous and contingent expenses for the Treasury Department, the provisions of section 6, act of August 23, 1912 (U. S. C., title 31, sec. 669), to the contrary notwithstanding, the packing, crating, drayage, and transportation of the personal effects of commissioned officers, scientific personnel, pharmacists, and nurses of the Public Health Service upon permanent change of station, and including the purchase (not to exceed $2,500), exchange, maintenance, repair, and operation of passenger-carrying automobiles for official use in field work, $1,550,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of the Mint—Office of Director of the Mint", on page 39, line 22, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$1,050,000" and insert "$1,190,000", so as to read:

Expenses, Silver Purchase and Gold Reserve Acts: For salaries and expenses in the Bureau of the Mint and the mints and assay offices in connection with carrying out the provisions of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934 and the Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and any Executive orders, proclamations, and regulations issued thereunder, including not to exceed $70,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, supplies and materials, travel, printing, rent, equipment, and miscellaneous expenses, $1,190,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Procurement Division—Public Buildings Branch", on page 43, line 18, after the word "activities", to strike out "$1,525,000" and insert "$1,600,000", so as to read:

Operating force for public buildings: For personal services, including also telephone operators for the operation of telephone switchboards or equivalent telephone switching equipment jointly serving in each case two or more governmental activities, $1,600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Procurement Division—Branch of Supply", on page 48, line 17, after the word "machines", to insert "and devices for mechanically operating typewriting machines", so as to read:

No part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1938 for the purchase of any standard typewriting machines, except bookkeeping and billing machines and devices for mechanically operating typewriting machines, at a price in excess of the following for models with carriages which will accomodate paper of the following widths, to wit: 10 inches (correspondence models), $70; 12 inches, $75; 14 inches, $77.50; 16 inches, $82.50; 18 inches, $87.50; 20 inches, $94; 22 inches, $95; 24 inches, $97.50; 26 inches, $103.50; 28 inches, $104; 30 inches, $105; 32 inches, $107.50; or, for standard typewriting machines distinctively quiet in operation, the maximum prices shall be as follows for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: 10 inches, $80; 12 inches, $85; 14 inches, $90; 18 inches, $95.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title II—Post Office Department—Salaries in bureaus and offices", on page 51, line 6, to change the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia, Office of the First Assistant Postmaster General, from $373,710 to $375,270.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 8, to change the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia, Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, from $569,810 to $578,230.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 10, to change the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia, Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster General, from $765,000 to $780,870.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 12, to change the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia, office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General from $447,500 to $461,640.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 14, to change the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia, office of the Solicitor for the Post Office Department, from $81,280 to $86,520.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, at the end of line 15, to change the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia, office of the chief inspector, from $216,000 to $223,320.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I observe that as to many items there are increases over the amounts provided by the House, and I assume increases over the Budget estimates. May I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee if I am correct?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. They are within the Budget estimates, but they are increases over the House figures. If the Senator will look at the different items, he will find the increases are very small. Upon satisfactory proof being presented to our committee, the committee allowed the increases. They are all within the Budget estimate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses, Post Office Department", on page 52, line 9, after the word "article", to strike out "47" and insert "49", and in line 10, before the word "convention", to strike out "London" and insert "Cairo", so as to read:

For contingent and miscellaneous expenses; stationery and blank books, index and guide cards, folders and binding devices, including purchase of free penalty envelops; telegraph and telephone service, furniture and filing cabinets and repairs thereto; purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of tools, electrical supplies, typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices; purchase of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle at not to exceed $2,500, including the exchange value of one such vehicle, and for maintenance of motor trucks and of two motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes (one for the Postmaster General and one for the general use of the Department); streetcar fares; floor coverings; postage stamps for correspondence addressed abroad, which is not exempt under article 49 of the Cairo convention of the Universal Postal Union; purchase and exchange of law books, books of reference, railway guides, city directories, and books necessary to conduct the business of the Department; newspapers, not exceeding $200; expenses, except membership fees, of attendance at meetings or conventions concerned with postal affairs, when incurred on the written authority of the Postmaster General, not exceeding $2,000; expenses of the purchasing agent and of the Solicitor and attorneys connected with his office while traveling on business of the Department, not exceeding $800; and other expenses not otherwise provided for; $84,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 25, after the word "elsewhere", to strike out "$1,150,000" and insert "$1,200,000", so as to read:

For printing and binding for the Post Office Department, including all of its bureaus, offices, institutions, and services located in Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, $1,200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of Chief Inspector", on page 55, line 8, after the word "and", to strike out "580" and insert "590", and in line 9, after the word "inspectors", to strike out "$2,232,500" and insert "$2,258,500", so as to read:

Salaries of inspectors: For salaries of 15 inspectors in charge of divisions and 590 inspectors, $2,258,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 22, after the word "Service" and the comma, to strike out "$612,575" and insert "$621,675", so as to read:

Traveling and miscellaneous expenses: For traveling expenses of inspectors, inspectors in charge, the chief post-office inspector, and the assistant chief post-office inspector, and for the traveling expenses of four clerks performing stenographic and clerical assistance to post-office inspectors in the investigation of important fraud cases; for tests, exhibits, documents, photographs, office and other necessary expenses incurred by post-office inspectors in connection with their official investigations, including necessary miscellaneous expenses of division headquarters, and not to exceed $500 for technical and scientific books and other books of reference needed in the operation of the Post Office Inspection Service, $621,675.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster General", on page 57, at the end of line 15, to increase the appropriation for separating mails at third- and fourth-class post offices from $425,000 to $450,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 9, to increase the appropriation for car fare and bicycle allowance, including special-delivery car fare, from $1,300,000 to $1,325,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 58, line 21, after the name "Alaska", to strike out "$207,245" and insert "$280,000", so as to read:

Star-route service, Alaska: For inland transportation by star routes in Alaska, $280,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 21, after the word "service", to strike out "$350,000" and insert "355,000", so as to read:

Electric- and cable-car service: For electric- and cable-car service, $355,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 23, after the word "otherwise", to strike out "$14,054,823" and insert "and for determining the feasibility of trans-Atlantic mail routes, "$14,700,000, so as to read:

Foreign mail transportation: For transportation of foreign mails by steamship, aircraft, or otherwise, and for determining the feasibility of trans-Atlantic mail routes, $14,700,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 2, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$9,230,823" and insert "$9,876,000", and in line 5, after the words "excess of", to strike out "$10,221,463" and insert "$10,408,000", so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That not to exceed $9,876,000 of this sum may be expended for carrying foreign mail by aircraft under contracts which will not create obligations for the fiscal year 1939 in excess of $10,408,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 23, to strike out "$14,250,000" and insert "$14,787,894.30", so as to read:

Contract air mail service: For the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, and for personal services for examining and auditing the books, records, and accounts of air-mail contractors, as authorized by law, and for the incidental expenses thereof, including not to exceed $22,200 for supervisory officials and clerks at air-mail transfer points, and not to exceed $46,460 for personal services in the District of Columbia and incidental and travel expenses, $14,787,894.30.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at this point I desire to offer a clarifying amendment on behalf of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 61, line 23, after the amendment just agreed to, to insert "of which not less than $1,687,894.30 shall be available for extensions, new routes, and increased frequency of schedules", so as to make the paragraph read:

Contract air-mail service: For the inland transportation of mail by aircraft, and for personal services for examining and auditing the books, records, and accounts of air-mail contractors, as authorized by law, and for the incidental expenses thereof, including not to exceed $22,200 for supervisory officials and clerks at air-mail transfer points, and not to exceed $46,460 for personal services in the District of Columbia and incidental and travel expenses, $14,787,894.30, of which not less than $1,687,894.30 shall be available for extensions, new routes, and increased frequency of schedules.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General", on page 64, line 5, after the word "offices", to insert "of the first, second, and third classes"; in line 6, after the word "purchase", to insert "or rental"; and on page 65, line 1, after the word "expenses", to strike out "$2,491,100" and insert "$2,621,000", so as to read:

Post-office stationery, equipment, and supplies: For stationery for the Postal Service, including the money-order and registry system; and also for the purchase of supplies for the Postal Savings System, including rubber stamps, canceling devices, certificates, envelopes, and stamps for use in evidencing deposits, and free penalty envelopes; and for the reimbursement of the Secretary of the Treasury for expenses incident to the preparation, issue, and registration of the bonds authorized by the act of June 25, 1910 (U. S. C., title 39, sec. 760); for miscellaneous equipment and supplies, including the purchase and repair of furniture, package boxes, posts, trucks, baskets, satchels, straps, letter-box paint, baling machines, perforating machines, duplicating machines, printing presses, directories, cleaning supplies, and the manufacture, repair, and exchange of equipment, the erection and painting of letter-box equipment, and for the purchase and repair of presses and dies for use in the manufacture of letter boxes; for postmarking, rating, money-order stamps, and electrotype plates and repairs to same; metal, rubber, and combination type, dates and figures, type holders, ink pads for canceling and stamping purposes, and for the purchase, exchange, and repair of typewriting machines, envelope-opening machines, and computing machines, numbering machines, time recorders, letter balances, scales (exclusive of dormant or built-in platform scales in Federal buildings), test weights, and miscellaneous articles purchased and furnished directly to the Postal Service, including complete equipment and furniture for post offices of the first, second, and third classes in leased and rented quarters; for the purchase or rental of arms and miscellaneous items necessary for the protection of the mails; for miscellaneous expenses in the preparation and publication of post-route maps and rural delivery maps or blueprints, including tracing for photolithographic reproduction; for other expenditures necessary and incidental to post offices of the first, second, and third classes, and offices of the fourth class having or to have rural delivery service, and for letter boxes; for the purchase of atlases and geographical and technical works not to exceed $1,500; for wrapping twine and tying devices; for expenses incident to the shipment of supplies, including hardware, boxing, packing, and not exceeding $55,000 for the pay of employees in connection therewith in the District of Columbia; for rental, purchase, exchange, and repair of canceling machines and motors, mechanical mail-handling apparatus, accident prevention, and other labor-saving devices, including cost of power in rented buildings and miscellaneous expenses of installation and operation of same, including not to exceed $35,000 for salaries of 13 traveling mechanicians, and for traveling expenses, $2,621,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 65, line 5, after the word "added", to strike out the colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purchase of furniture and complete equipment for third-class post offices except miscellaneous equipment of the general character furnished such offices during the fiscal year 1931.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 66, line 10, after the word "offices", to strike out "$11,200,000" and insert "$11,400,000", so as to read:

Rent, light, and fuel: For rent, light, fuel, and water, for first-, second-,, and third-class post offices, and the cost of advertising for lease proposals for such offices, $11,400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 67, line 3, after the word "vehicles", to insert a comma and "including those received by transfer from other departments, establishments, or agencies of the Government", so as to read:

Vehicle service: For vehicle service; the hire of vehicles; the rental of garage facilities; the purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of motor vehicles, including those received by transfer from other departments, establishments, or agencies of the Government; accident prevention; the hire of supervisors, clerical assistance, mechanics, drivers, garagemen, and such other employees as may be necessary in providing vehicles and vehicle service for use in the collection, transportation, delivery, and supervision of the mail, $15,250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Public buildings, maintenance and operation", on page 69, line 4, after the word "herein", to strike out "$5,000,000" and insert "$5,100,000", so as to read.

Operating supplies, public buildings: For fuel, steam, gas, and electric current for lighting, heating, and power purposes, water, ice, lighting supplies, removal of ashes and rubbish, snow and ice, cutting grass and weeds, washing towels, telephone service for custodial forces, and for miscellaneous services and supplies, accident prevention, tools and appliances, for the operation and completed and occupied public buildings and grounds, including mechanical and electrical equipment, but not the repair thereof, operated by the Post Office Department, including the Washington Post Office and the Customhouse Building in the District of Columbia, and for the transportation of articles and supplies authorized herein, $5,100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, after line 21, to strike out the following section:

SEC. 5. No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of any person detailed or loaned for service in connection with any investigation or inquiry undertaken by any committee of either House of Congress under special resolution thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, line 3, to change the section number from 6 to 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerks will be authorized to renumber all sections where necessary. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], I desire to ask about the $500,000,000 appropriation carried on page 4, line 19. This is the beginning of the old-age reserve account under title II of the so-called Security Act, I understand?

Mr. MCKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I desire to ask the Senator to what extent the $500,000,000 is offset by the collection of pay-roll taxes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. That did not appear before our committee.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think I have the information.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I hope the Senator will give it to the Senate. That item, of course, increases the total amount of the bill very much, to the extent of about $235,000,000, but the social security law has been enacted, and it was represented to the committee that it is necessary, in order to carry out the Government's part of the social security law, to have this additional sum. That is why it is in the bill. I hope the Senator will give to the Senate the facts which he has.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator information as to what will be done with the balance of the pay-roll tax collections in excess of $500,000,000 which is here appropriated?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I do not think anyone knows as yet whether there will be an excess, but if there is an excess it will go to the fund.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Inasmuch as this is the inception, the first appropriation for the full reserve fund in respect to the compulsory old-age benefit payments under title II of the Social Security Act, I desire to make a brief statement in connection with it, because I think it touches one of the most fundamental fiscal challenges confronting the Government.

This is the first large annual appropriation to the full reserve fund which is provided under the Social Security Act for old-age benefit payments. The whole reserve fund ultimately becomes $47,000,000,000, the most fantastic and the most indefensible objective imaginable. It is scarcely conceivable that rational men should propose such an unmanageable accumulation of funds in one place in a democracy. Still worse, it is needless from the sound standpoint of this compulsory tax-supported old-age pension system itself. Indeed, it actually penalizes and hampers these laudatory and necessary social objectives by diverting pay-roll tax revenues which otherwise could be used to hasten and expand the benefit payments, and at the same time could be used to avoid the contemplated step-up in the percentage of pay-roll taxes for a considerable period.

The alternative to the full reserve is a candid pay-as-you-go system, with only a contingent reserve for emergency purposes. The alternative avoids the necessity of accumulating this monstrous sum of $47,000,000,000 out of taxes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Of course, the Social Security Act has already been passed, and, so far as the Appropriations Committee are concerned we are obliged to appropriate in accordance with the law. When the estimate was made and brought before the Appropriations Committee, we did so; but the Senator is addressing himself to the law itself.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, there is not any doubt in the world about that, and I am about so to state; but I think the challenge is so tremendous that except as Congress is forced to direct its attention to the amendment of that section of the Social Security Act itself, the matter will drift into a situation which will become exceedingly menacing in the near future.

I was just saying that the alternative to the full reserve is a contingent reserve. I was saying that the alternative avoids the necessity of accumulating the $47,000,000,000. I now assert that the alternative is approved by the experts of every large insurance company in the United States. This statement is based on my personal contact with more than 60 of them. What I am now saying does not argue against the immediate $500,000,000 reserve appropriation in the pending bill, because under either system—whether full reserve or contingent reserve—the pay-roll tax collections for a year or two would have to go to reserve; but I am using this highly appropriate occasion to point the progressive menace that lies ahead, under the terms of this unfortunate section of the Social Security Act, if the reserve problem is not promptly and constructively attacked and wisely dealt with.

The Senate Finance Committee already has had one highly illuminating hearing on my Senate resolution dealing with this subject, and has agreed, in conjunction with the Social Security Board, to set up a detached advisory council of experts to make subsequent recommendations regarding it. But at this moment, when we are making the first half-billion-dollar appropriation for the reserve and are thus actually launching this vast enterprise, I desire briefly to emphasize the problem to the Senate and to the country, lest in the pressure of other more spectacular matters it may go by default. Any such default would spell needless exploitation of our people and needless handicap to social security, and it cannot be overstressed, Mr. President, that what I am saying is in the interest of the Social Security Act itself and a broadening of its benefits and advantages.

Up to last March 1, 24,460,045 wage earners and 2,634,703 employers had registered under the provisions of this title of the Social Security Act; and I observe by a release which comes to my desk this morning from the Social Security Board that on March 16 they passed the twenty-five millionth master card, representing the twenty-five millionth wage earner who has registered under this section of the bill. Each one of these wage earners is paying his share of this year's 2-percent pay-roll tax. He is paying one-half of it. The employer is paying the other half of the 2 percent, his share also being 1 percent. They are paying together in excess of $600,000,000 in pay-roll taxes this year. The amount will progressively increase hereafter.

The Senate will recall that this 2-percent tax, which this year yields in excess of $600,000,000, goes up to 3 percent in 1940, again equally divided between employer and employee; to 4 percent in 1943; to 5 percent in 1946; to 6 percent in 1949; and thereafter stays at 6 percent. Benefit payments, however, except in a few relatively rare cases, do not generally start until January 1, 1942, and even then on a pathetically slim basis, for wage earners now in middle life. Practically all of the revenue from pay-roll taxes goes into reserve until 1942. A goodly portion continues to go into reserve thereafter until the reserve reaches $47,000,000,000, in 1980. In other words, it is the greedy appetite of the reserve which eats up a large portion of these pay-roll tax revenues, and thus needlessly diverts it from the Social Security Act objectives which it is presumed to promote, and which ought to be the first charge upon our consideration.

I have said that it is a needless diversion. That is the whole question. Is the full reserve necessary? Let us see. It is not half so perplexing as it seems. The simplest way to understand it is to contemplate what finally happens in 1980, when the full reserve has been built to the astronomical sum of $47,000,000,000, all invested, by the terms of the act, in United States Government securities yielding 3 percent. Let us call it a round $50,000,000,000 for the sake of easy calculation.

What happens? The old-age pension fund cashes its 3-percent coupons on $50,000,000,000 of Government bonds and gets $1,500,000,000 to put into its benefit payments that year, and similarly each year thereafter. Congress, in turn, raises that billion and a half dollars by means of general taxes to pay the interest on the Government bonds which the old-age pension fund owns.

In other words, the general taxpayer pays the particular billion and a half dollars that goes into the payment of old-age benefits in 1980, and each year thereafter. It would cost the general taxpayer no more to pay a direct subsidy of a billion and a half dollars into the pension fund. It would be the same billion and a half dollars.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. If the Senator will let me finish this paragraph, I shall then be happy to yield to him.

I was saying that it is the same billion and a half dollars. If it were thus directly done—that is to say, by a direct appropriation of a billion and a half dollars to the Social Security fund instead of to a fund to pay interest on the $50,000,000,000 of bonds which the Social Security Board owns—if it were a direct transaction, it never would have been necessary to raise most of the $47,000,000,000 wrung from employers, employees, and general taxpayers in previous years to create the full reserve. In other words, apparently simply for the sake of avoiding a frank confession that our old-age pension system is not intended to be entirely self-supporting, and that it does require an annual subsidy from general taxation—to which I have no objection whatever—simply for the purpose of hiding that subsidy fact we go to the amazing expense and burden and hazard of accumulating this full reserve.

I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, assuming that in 1980 the national debt, the amount of bonds which are outstanding, will be $50,000,000,000—and I take it that we would not issue bonds just for the purpose of investing in them the money of the reserve——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; that is exactly what it will be necessary to do, as I am about to show the Senator in just a moment.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. To the extent, then, that the bonds which are purchased are bonds issued for the purpose of raising money for other governmental expenditures, is it not entirely proper that the taxpayers should pay the interest on those bonds, and would not they pay the interest on those bonds whether they were held by this reserve fund or by a bank or by a private citizen?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am afraid the Senator has missed my point. I am not complaining at all about the fact that the taxpayer pays the money. I am complaining because in 1980—using that typical year just for the sake of round figures—the reserve fund contributes the interest on $50,000,000,000 principal, to wit, one billion and a half dollars, to the reserve fund; and that this contribution, which is necessary in order to make the benefit payments that year, comes out of an appropriation of the Congress, assessed against the taxpayer in general. In other words, the general taxpayer has to make the appropriation to pay the interest on the bonds. It would be the same billion and a half dollars if Congress made a direct appropriation into the Social Security reserve fund, thus avoiding the necessity of ever having had to accumulate the forty-seven or fifty-billion-dollar fund at all; and while we are needlessly accumulating the $50,000,000,000 reserve we are diverting a major portion of these pay-roll taxes from the objective to which they ought to be dedicated—namely, an enhancement of the benefit payments under the Social Security Act itself, or a lightening of the tax load.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I think the Senator said we will have $600,000,000 this year.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is estimated that the pay-roll collections this year will be in excess of $600,000,000; but let us call it $600,000,000 for easy calculation.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Where will they get the bonds in which to invest?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I shall come to that in just a moment. I desire to trace the transactions, because it is particularly illuminating.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should not assume to ask the Senate to agree with me solely upon my own responsibility in respect to a problem of this magnitude, involving the actuarial considerations which are concerned in it, and I remind the Senate again that the experts of every major life-insurance company in the United States agree with the thing I am saying here today, agree that it is not necessary to have this full reserve, and that the social-security compulsory old-age pensions can better be served on a pay-as-you-go basis, with a contingent reserve, and that the beneficiaries of the Social Security Act will be infinitely better off as a result, as will be the Nation as a whole.

I have been trying to demonstrate the basis for that statement. I have visualized the problem as it will exist in 1980, when the $47,000,000,000 climax will arrive. The same problem in relatively lesser degree will arise each year from now until 1980. Each year the full reserve will be a corresponding burden and a needless burden to a nation which has taxes enough to pay without being asked to pay needless taxes.

Mr. President, that is not all. Now, I am coming to the problem submitted by the able Senator from Washington.

The actual thing which happens each year in respect to this reserve—and I refer now to the Treasury mechanics—is little short of alarming. Let us see how it works. The Treasury this year will collect about $600,000,000 in these pay-roll taxes for social-security purposes. The money does not go into earmarked trusts. It goes into and mingles with the general revenue. Congress then appropriates $500,000,000 to the reserve fund, which is what we are doing today. The Secretary of the Treasury does not put the money into the reserve fund. Oh, no; he keeps the money, and, as required by the act, issues 3-percent bonds to the reserve fund. Those are permanent bonds. The principal of the bonds is rarely ever cashed or touched. It is only the interest on the bonds which ordinarily concerns the reserve fund. So what has happened? Social security gets a permanent I O U for $500,000,000 under the terms of the bill we are now passing. The Secretary of the Treasury gets the $500,000,000 in cash to apply on general debts and deficits. To be sure, there is a bookkeeping debit, but actually social security helps to finance our current general Federal expenditures. In other words, we use the proceeds of a gross income tax on labor, raised in the pious name of social security, to cushion the General Treasury.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, I do not like to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am very happy to have the Senator interrupt me. It is a very perplexing and complicating thing which I am trying to reduce to simple terms.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. We have this $500,000,000. Is it not fair to assume that if the Treasury did not get the $500,000,000 from this source it would get it from some other source? The $500,000,000 is to be used in the operation of the Government during this period of time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. If the Government did not get it through the sale of this kind of bonds to the Social Security, it would get it from the sale of another kind of bonds to banks or somebody else. Is not that correct?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. And the interest on the $500,000,000 would be paid by the people of the country, because we would have to collect the money with which to pay the interest in the form of taxes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes; but there is a point the Senator totally overlooks in his calculation. I am complaining, and I submit that the beneficiary of social security has the right to complain, that his pay-roll taxes, which presumably are raised for a social-security purpose, are the instrumentalities that are used to cushion this general Federal financing under the operations the Senator is discussing.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. But the Senator is complaining about a different thing from what he was discussing when I started to interrupt him. The point in which I am interested particularly is the Senator's statement that there would be a double payment of this million and a half interest.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, no; I am sorry the Senator did not catch my meaning. I did not say there would be a double payment; I said it would be the same billion and a half, so far as the taxpayer is concerned, if it is taken from him to pay the interest on the bonds or if it is taken from him to pay a direct subsidy into the fund.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. But the Senator intimated that it would be necessary to have an appropriation each year and that, as a matter of fact, the general public was going to be compelled to pay this interest.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. But if they did not pay the interest item on this $500,000,000, they would pay it upon another $500,000,000, because the money would be used by the Government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But the other $500,000,000 is related to the general debt of the Government. The $500,000,000 involved in social security is not related to the general operations of the Government; and I am complaining that it is insisted that $47,000,000,000 be set aside for a reserve in order to produce an annual interest return to the fund, when, if the $47,000,000,000 were not set aside at all, and the annual charge were simply paid into the Social Security fund by way of frank subsidy, the same thing exactly would be done for the Social Security fund, and the wage earners of the country, who pay half of the pay-roll tax, and the employers of the country, who pay the other half of the pay-roll tax, would be saved the necessity of being taxed through the years to accumulate this needless $47,000,000,000.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The Senator does not complain that, so far as the taxpayer is concerned, assuming that this $500,000,000 will be spent anyway, the taxpayer would have to pay the tax to settle the interest on the $500,000,000, whether it goes through the Social Security fund or not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Exactly. There is one other very interesting point I should like to mention; it had escaped my mind. It shows another of the absurdities involved in this particular section of the Social Security Act. I beg of the Senator to realize that I am speaking only of this particular section. I voted for the Social Security Act, and I believe in it.

Under the terms of the act the Secretary of the Treasury is required to provide a United States Government security for this reserve fund which yields the reserve fund 3 percent. So where does Mr. Morgenthau find himself this afternoon after this bill is passed? He finds himself with $500,000,000, which has to go into the Social Security reserve on a 3-percent basis.

There are no United States Government bonds at the present time selling on the basis of a yield of 3 percent, or anything like it. So he cannot get any existing Government bond to put into this reserve today on a 3-percent basis. What he will do—and it is what he has already done with some preliminary funds—is to issue a special 3-percent Government bond to the reserve tomorrow, after this bill shall be enacted, at a time when money can be procured in the open market on the basis of 1¼, 1⅛, and 1⅜ percent. In other words, under the operation of the law as it applies to this particular appropriation, the Treasury Department is forced, first, by the existence of a needless full reserve fund, second, by the requirement that it be invested only in Government bonds yielding 3 percent, to pay 3 percent for static money, when it can get it in the open market for 1¼ percent. That is just one of numerous collateral phases of this particular section of the Social Security Act which multiply and amplify the problem I am trying to bring to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. Has the Senator figured out and can he tell us what the loss to the Government will be through the issuance of these 3-percent bonds when money can be obtained in the market at a very much lower rate?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I have made no such calculation; but it is manifestly a large item. One can make a mental calculation, for instance, respecting the $500,000,000. The difference between 3 percent on $500,000,000 and, say, 1¼ percent on $500,000,000 is something around $10,000,000, just applied to the first payment down on this enormous fund, which will ultimately reach the perfectly preposterous and incalculable figure of $47,000,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I assure the Senator I have no other object in interrupting him than to get clear in my mind, if I can, the point which the Senator is attempting to elucidate. There may be some dispute about it, but, for the sake of my question, let us assume that it is desirable—and I think we did assume that when we passed the law—that a reserve fund should be created. Then the question follows: What are we going to do with the reserve fund? Naturally, we would invest it. I think it will be conceded that the safest place to put it would be in Government bonds; and is not that going to be the ultimate disposition of the fund?

The Secretary of the Treasury, as a matter of fact, in order to comply with the law, issues a bond or an I O U, if we wish to call it that, bearing 3 percent interest; and for the moment he cannot invest it in bonds, because the Government is not at this time issuing any 3-percent bonds. Yet, ultimately, as I understand, the fund would be used for the purpose of paying off Government bonds. I concede that in the meantime it might be used for the ordinary financial transactions of the Government; but there would come a time when the bonds outstanding would be due and would be paid, and eventually there would be enough money in this fund to take up all the Government bonds.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, yes; and a great deal more.

Mr. NORRIS. For the present I do not think we ought to worry much about that, because we can stop payment into this fund if the time ever comes when we shall have taken up all the Government bonds, the result of which would be that the Social Security reserve fund would be invested in such bonds.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. The Social Security Act provides for the creation of the fund and provides that the fund shall be properly invested so as to bring in money for the purpose of complying with the terms of the act.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Social Security Board will practically own the national debt.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and when we pay interest on Government bonds held by the Social Security fund we will really be paying to ourselves, instead of paying to banks and individuals and investment companies.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. We would get out of it whatever interest would be paid on the bonds.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit a further interruption?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes, indeed.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize that the Secretary of the Treasury could now issue bonds of the Government at a lower rate of interest than 3 percent. At the time we passed the Social Security Act investment conditions were different from those which now exist. The money market was somewhat different. I suppose we may assume that 3 percent is a very low rate of interest for Government bonds. Heretofore the rate of interest on Government bonds has been much higher than that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What I desire to be sure the Senator from Nebraska understands is that this rate-of-interest factor was purely casual, and was brought in simply through my exchange of comment with the able Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH]. That is purely beside and outside the fundamental reserve question, which seems to me to preponderate in this challenge. As the Senator has said, what finally happens is that the Social Security Board owns all of the national debt. That is what happens.

This is my complaint: In order to get the money to own the entire national debt and virtually retire it—because the principal is never to be used by the Social Security Board, just the interest—in order to complete that operation, the Secretary of the Treasury, in the name of the Social Security Board, will have to accumulate this $47,000,000,000 of reserve out of taxes on the wage earners. Therefore, the net result of the operation is that when the national debt is transferred to the ownership of the Social Security Board, it actually has been financed by a gross income tax on the lowest-paid income group in the United States, and it has been done in the pious name of social security.

In my judgment, in view of the way this thing got into the bill, the purpose of putting it in in the first place was to provide a cushion for Treasury financing during these difficult times. Let us not have any mistake about whether or not there is any justification for that statement. When this bill was originally drawn, so far as I can determine, practically all of the President's advisers on the special commission that he set up to write the Social Security Act either leaned to the contingent reserve as opposed to the full reserve, or were actually in favor of the contingent reserve instead of the full reserve. I am advised that at least three of the four actuaries who were primarily consulted when the law was written were opposed to the full reserve.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not question anybody's idea about it. It is a question on which honest men will disagree.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Honest men will disagree as to whether we should pay as we go or whether we should set up a reserve.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not impugning any motive anywhere in the discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that. I have always favored the setting up of a reserve. It does not follow that I should want to set up a high enough reserve so that the income on it would pay the entire debt. The object in setting up a reserve in this case would be similar to that actuating a man who had a mortgage on his home, who would set aside something which would meet the debt when it finally came due. Another man might differ with him and say that instead of doing that he would renew the mortgage, and in the meantime use for other purposes the amount he could set aside as a reserve to pay the debt when it came due. Some hardship might be incurred in setting aside a reserve. However, it has always seemed to me that it would be better to set aside a reserve to meet a future contingency, in spite of the fact that we have to endure some hardships in doing it, and even though we could save that money, or use it for other purposes, or not even raise it by taxation; but we would have to levy a higher rate of taxes in order to pay as we go, and would not have the benefit of any income from the reserve.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am very anxious to comment specifically upon what the Senator from Nebraska has just said. Before I do so, however, let me finish what I was saying when the able Senator interrupted me.

I was undertaking to say that when this particular section of the Social Security Act was written, the great weight of social security testimony in the country was against the full reserve; and I think the bill was drawn on that basis in the first instance. It was not until the bill reached the House Ways and Means Committee and the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the committee—and I think he had a letter from the President in connection with his appearance—that the full reserve was forced into the bill; forced in not, in my judgment, because of its advantage to the Social Security Act, but forced in fundamentally and probably predominantly as a Treasury operation, so that these pay-roll tax revenues could cushion the Treasury in connection with its difficult financial operations in these difficult years.

I revert now to the observations of the Senator from Nebraska, and his suggestion that it is the course of wisdom and prudence to accumulate a reserve against a subsequent obligation. Of course that is true, so far as abstract economics is concerned. The best parallel to draw would be a parallel between a private insurance company and its operation on the full reserve system. The private insurance company operates on exactly the kind of system against which I am complaining in connection with title II of the Social Security Act. The difference is that when a private insurance company receives a premium it has to amortize its obligation out of every premium it receives, because it has no assurance of revenue tomorrow and the day after. The difference between a private insurance system and a public insurance system is that the public system does not have to cushion itself against all of tomorrow's contingencies, because it is guaranteed a substantial and constant and continuing revenue by law through constancy of compulsory pay-roll taxes. The only factor of doubt that confronts the public insurance system is whether or not employment will fluctuate, as the result of which the pay-roll taxes fluctuate. Therefore every executive of every major insurance company in this country—and I shall put the list in the RECORD—agrees that the public system does not need the full reserve such as the private system has to operate on and such as the Senator from Nebraska was discussing as the normal prudent procedure in respect to a private obligation, but merely requires a relatively small contingent reserve.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Cannot a fair analogy be drawn between the suggestion which has been made as to the pay-as-you-go system and the mutual assessment insurance companies? I think the history of the mutual assessment insurance companies will prove that in the long run they are not successful. So long as the assessment is small—in other words, so long as the indemnities are small, and the company is going along nicely, all the policyholders stay in and pay their assessments, but when for a period of a year or 2 years or 3 years the indemnities are particularly high, then the policyholders withdraw. Would we not be running the risk of the same danger if we had what would be analogous to the mutual assessment system, a pay-as-you-go system? So long as the indemnities were low, so long as the amount appropriated by Congress was low, we could go ahead and the cost would be taken care of out of appropriations; but would we not face the danger if there should ensue a period of high indemnities and of large appropriations of somebody saying, "Well, we must abandon this thing"; and those who had ordered their lives with the idea that after a certain age they would receive a pension; would have that assurance taken away from them?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; I do not think there is the slightest analogy to be correctly drawn in the fashion my friend proposes, and this is the reason: The mutual assessment system to which he refers has absolutely no assurance whatsoever of one penny's income beyond today; it is at the mercy of any contingency that may confront it in the future; and the Senator has described some of the contingencies that confront it. As assessments become larger people drop their insurance, and the whole plan becomes unsatisfactory. The income of the mutual system collapses, and the whole show is over. The public system is not troubled by a single one of those factors, because it knows, to a reasonable certainty, what its income is to be tomorrow, the next day and the next day, and even the income in 1980 is identified.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in a moment if the Senator will permit me. Please do not overlook the fact that in the pay-as-you-go system there is a contingency reserve. No one is suggesting that there should not be some protection against the ebb and flow of pay-roll tax revenues into this fund. There is some disagreement as to how much of a contingent reserve is necessary. There has been some discussion of $3,000,000,000, and I have heard the suggestion made that the reserve should be as high as $8,000,000,000. That is one of the subjects that are going to be discussed by the special board of experts which the Senate Finance Committee has very generously and sympathetically created. There is a contingency reserve against the casual emergent moment when something may happen that has been unforeseen. But the issue is drawn between this contingent reserve, which does not require the accumulation of this particularly gargantuan fund of $47,000,000,000 on the one hand, and a contingent reserve on the other hand, which can be reasonably accumulated without any burden whatsoever either on the wage earner, who pays half the pay-roll tax, or on the employer, who pays the other half of the pay-roll tax.

Mr. President, at this point I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, a list of life-insurance executives, found at page 14 of the Senate committee hearings, embracing the names of in excess of 60 of the greatest insurance experts in America, men who are in contact with the greatest body of expert experience in the country, men who have the largest right to speak from experience in respect to this problem. These gentlemen, without equivocation, insist that the full reserve system is not necessary in order to accomplish the result which we desire. I may say that, before I shall have concluded, I wish to demonstrate some of the alternative results that can be obtained in the interest and welfare of the social-security client himself if this major menace is removed. I ask that the list be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the list will be printed in the RECORD.

The list is as follows:

Thomas A. Buckner, president, New York Life Insurance Co., New York, N. Y.
William H. Kingsley, president, Penn Mutual Life Insurance Co., Philadelphia, Pa.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I now yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, do we not find a parallel between the private insurance company, of whatever character it may be, and the Federal Government in operating the social-security program in this fact: The Senator has spoken of the necessity for the private insurance company finding a profitable investment for its funds; obviously it has to have such investment; but there come times when it cannot find it, and the Senator says that a full reserve is necessitated in order to meet that condition.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is only one of the several reasons why it is necessary that they have a full reserve.

Mr. BONE. There is also this contingency confronting private insurance companies: In a time of great stress, such as we have been going through in recent years, when millions of men become idle, they lose their insurance by defaulting in the payment of their premiums. The insurance companies keep that money; they will never again have to pay it out; they have that tremendous cushion. Furthermore, they are using tables of longevity that were employed three-quarters of a century ago. We have a different picture confronting us today. So the average insurance company is collecting more premiums than are sufficient in normal times to care for their load, for their liability. But does not the Government confront the same situation in a time of stress such as we have been going through? When millions of men go off the pay rolls does not the Government confront a situation that is quite similar to that confronted by the average private insurance company?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator right there so as not to lose the thread of his question?

Mr. BONE. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I understand precisely the point the Senator is making. The highest estimate of which I ever heard of a reserve that would be necessary to cushion our experience in the last depression, if this law had been in force throughout the depression, was $2,000,000,000.

Mr. BONE. Is not that largely theoretical?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Well, Mr. President, the whole proposition is theoretical; all actuarial conclusions are theoretical; but they are reasonably reliable, as we find by experience.

Mr. BONE. Insurance companies are relying upon mortality tables some of which were formulated three-quarters of a century ago; the span of life has materially increased, but the insurance companies have not changed their mortality tables. Obviously, today many of the insurance companies are collecting more in the way of premiums than is necessary to sustain them.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Of course, I am not defending private insurance companies here today, and they have no place in my argument except by analogy.

Mr. BONE. I understand that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. They are not involved in the question of whether or not the public system should be based on a full reserve.

Mr. BONE. Perhaps I should not have injected that thought into the discussion, but I feel that the Government is in something of the same position that the private insurance companies are in. They have to build up these gigantic bodies of wealth, represented by security issues and personal property of all kinds in the attempt to fortify themselves and cushion themselves against the shock of abnormally large payments of money. Frankly, I can hardly bring myself to believe that the Government ought not to parallel that proceeding, because it seems to me that the Federal Government, going into that business as it has, is stepping into a field of operations very similar to that of insurance companies, and, if they have found desirable the method referred to, I am inclined to think that the Federal Government could for the time being, at least, for a few years, parallel it until we know precisely what the real answer is.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I want the Senator to hear me through and see what price we are paying, at the expense of the wage earner, for the experiment which the Senator recommends that we carry on for a while longer.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I should like to make one more brief statement, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. BONE. We cannot get something for nothing in this world; at least, I have never discovered how it may be done.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, yes; we got $2,000,000,000 out of gold devaluation for nothing, just with a fountain pen and an imagination.

Mr. BONE. But the insurance that citizens of this country have been able to carry has been paid for out of their pockets.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. BONE. And I do not know how we are going to set up any sort of an intelligent insurance system without someone paying for it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. They are going to pay for it; there is no question about that.

Mr. BONE. Precisely.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But they should not overpay for it. That is the only thing I am saying.

Mr. BONE. I do not believe they are overpaying when a necessary reserve is being created.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not, either, if a necessary reserve is being created; but I think I can prove that if it is an unnecessary reserve, then they are paying too much. Is not that true?

Mr. BONE. I agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, inasmuch as this entire reserve, amounting to $47,000,000,000, ultimately has got to be invested in United States Government securities, the net result of the contemplation, among other things, is that by mandate of law we are committed to a permanent national debt of this crushing size, and all through the interim we have made public spending just so much easier and public economy just so much less essential. It is the most vicious influence ever conceived in connection with our public affairs. It puts a premium upon spendthriftism, and it is perfectly obvious that it does. That may not be its purpose. That, however, is the indisputable net result.

The distinguished Governor of the Federal Reserve System, Mr. Eccles, made a very courageous statement yesterday, and I want to commend him for it. He pointed to one of the real crises which America confronts. There is no real crisis which America confronts that relates to the Supreme Court at all. One of the real crises that America confronts is the maintenance of law and order as a basis of civilized existence. Illegal trespass cannot be condoned, no matter who the trespasser may be. But the principal crisis that America confronts, which Governor Eccles identified yesterday, is the menace of a creeping, seeping, ultimately uncontrolled inflation which will crucify—which can crucify, I prefer to say—everything of value in this Nation, and every man, woman, and child under the flag.

Governor Eccles said that we cannot wait much longer for a balanced Federal Budget if we are to avoid this menace. I am happy that such testimony at last has come from some high-ranking official of this administration. It was about time. He said that to avoid inflation and to obtain a balanced Budget without charging the enterprise to anybody who is in want or need, he would be willing, if necessary, to increase the tax structure of the country. I think that was a brave statement, too.

I think he omitted another brave statement that he could and should have made—that it is equally important that a decent regard for elementary economy in the administration of the Government might well start to get ready to begin to commence to contribute toward this balancing of the Budget.

But the thing I want particularly to say about the Eccles' statement, bearing directly upon the proposition I am submitting to the Senate this afternoon, is this: If the Governor of the Federal Reserve System is correct and we confront, first, the necessity of a balanced Budget; second, the necessity of more taxes to accomplish that end; or, third, an inflationary movement which will be devastating, then there is double necessity for abandoning this full reserve under the Social Security Act for the following reasons:

If additional tax revenues are necessary to the Government, it certainly is the course of wisdom to lighten the tax load at any point where it can be lightened without danger to the advantageous social service which the Government is undertaking to render. If we abandon the full reserve system and go to a pay-as-you-go system, with a contingent reserve in respect to the compulsory old-age pension system, it is indisputable that we could either reduce the existing 2-percent pay-roll tax if we wanted to do so, or at the very least we could avoid the progressive increase in that tax during the years to come which the law itself requires.

I have excellent authority for that statement. I quote the chief actuary of the Social Security Board himself, Mr. W. R. Williamson, in an article which he wrote for the official organ of the Actuarial Society of America in October 1935. I ask Senators to listen to this quotation from the chief actuary of the Social Security Board:

> Were the reserve plan abandoned without immediate increase in the present scale of benefits, the staff suggestion of initial contribution rates of one-half percent from the employer and one-half percent from the employee, advancing slowly to a maximum of 2½ percent from each after 20 years, would meet apparent benefit requirements for a long time to come.

In other words, if we abandon the full reserve system and go to the contingent reserve basis, thus shaking ourselves loose from this ultimate $47,000,000,000 Frankenstein, instead of taxing the wage earner 1 percent today as his share of today's 2-percent pay-roll tax, we would only have to tax him one-half of 1 percent, and instead of increasing that tax to 3 percent on the wage earner alone in the course of the next 12 or 15 years, we would not have to go over 2½-percent maximum for several decades to come.

The first benefit from abandoning the needless full reserve system is to reduce in part the necessity for current taxation upon wage earners, upon the one hand, and the employer upon the other.

Reverting now to the statement by Governor Eccles, I repeat that if it is going to be necessary courageously to increase the tax burden upon the people of the United States in a fashion which he has indicated, it certainly is inadvisable to continue a needless tax which obviously saps the resources from the reservoir out of which the ultimate emancipation has got to come.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not at all convinced, although I think I have an open mind on the subject; so far as I know I have. I am still not convinced that we ought to try, without a reserve fund, to solve the question the Senator is discussing.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator let me finish my reference to Governor Eccles before he diverts me to another subject?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have now indicated one reason why, if Governor Eccles is correct, there is a particularly emphasized need for the thing I am urging. Here is another reason:

If Governor Eccles is correct, and I think he is, that a progressively increasing high cost of living in the United States is going to prove insufferably burdensome to the American people, as a result of the inflationary movement with which we are entirely surrounded, then anything that contributes needlessly to the inflationary movement ought to be rejected promptly in the name of precaution. This full reserve is inflationary in its effect. Why? Because every penny of the pay-roll tax which the employer pays will be passed on to the public in the form of an increased commodity price. It becomes nothing more nor less in that effect than a general sales tax, and it increases by just that amount the cost of commodities in this country, and by just that amount increases the inflationary pressure of the high cost of living.

Any factor that can be restricted or eliminated—always saying, in this connection, that it must not be done with any impairment of the objectives of the Social Security Act—anything that can be done ought to be done in favor of the general situation and jeopardy which we confront.

Now, I think I have concluded my reference to Governor Eccles' statement; and if the Senator from Nebraska will be good enough to renew his question, I shall be happy to hear it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that he has, at least in part, answered the question I was about to propound. I do not think I have any question at this time.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I have long overstayed my time on the floor. I had no thought of an extended discussion of this problem. I am indebted to Senators for the attention they have given me in connection with it. I feel that it is one of the fundamentally important matters that ought to be explored promptly and effectively. I am speaking today in criticism of no one nor in complaint against anything that has been done in respect to the Social Security Act. It is amazing, as a matter of fact, that so competent an act could have been written, under the circumstances, so quickly and with so few flaws.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. It is very gratifying to me to have the Senator make the statement he has just made. While I was extremely desirous of taking the step that we took in the Social Security Act, I must admit that to a great extent the step was in the dark; and if everyone were candid with himself and with the country, I believe he would have to say the same thing. I could not see through the problem; and it may be that we levied a tax that is too high. I think we had better have done that and lower it afterward than to find out that we had not levied one high enough and have to raise it afterward.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. I found, in taking up individual cases, that the tax which is levied is a hardship. All taxes, of course, are; but in a good many instances this tax is going to be quite a hardship; and I should welcome the idea, if we can safely adopt it, of amending that part of the Social Security Act so as to reduce the tax levied on the employer and the employee, too.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his observations. That is my whole objective. Simply because we may be devotedly attached to the Social Security Act's objectives, I do not feel that we should decline cold-bloodedly to analyze its mathematics in behalf of betterment; and when I find myself irresistibly convinced, and supported in that conviction by all the greatest actuarial experts in the United States, as I have indicated, that by the abandonment of the full reserve and the substitution of the pay-as-you-go system with a contingent reserve, we can do either one of two things: First, reduce the pay-roll tax; or, second, increase and hasten the payment of the benefits. When I find myself confronting those advantages from a change in the system, necessarily I find myself under compulsion to urge the issue upon every possible occasion.

I desire to say for the Social Security Board that it has been generous, sympathetic, cooperative with me in every effort I have made thus far in the exploration of this problem. I desire to say for the Senate Finance Committee that entirely without respect to any political consideration the Finance Committee has cooperated splendidly in the efforts I am undertaking to probe this thing to a conclusive, dependable finality; and this is the way we are proposing to do it:

The able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the chairman of the Finance Committee, has appointed a subcommittee of three, consisting of himself, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and myself, to discuss with the Social Security Board members the creation of an utterly independent and detached advisory council of experts to whom we shall submit the double question:

First, is the full reserve necessary? There is no doubt in my mind as to the answer to that question. Second, if it is not necessary, what shall we do with the vast sums we can save by abandoning the reserve? Shall we, first, reduce pay-roll taxes; or, second, hasten increased benefit payments; or, third, shall we combine these two objectives?

Mr. President, in conclusion I desire to observe that the Hearst newspapers recently created a nonpartisan social security commission for a study of all the problems related to the Social Security Act. On March 8 this commission issued its first report on the reserve problem which I have been discussing; and I am happy to say that from that source comes complete corroboration for the conclusions I have been presuming to offer to the Senate this afternoon.

I ask that at the conclusion of my remarks there be printed in the RECORD, first, the identification of the members of this nonpartisan social security commission, and, second, a brief summary of its conclusions on the reserve question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MEMBERS LISTED

Following is a list of members of the commission:

James J. Davis, United States Senator from Pennsylvania and former Secretary of Labor. Mr. Davis voted in favor of the Social Security Act.

Henry I. Harriman, former president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and member of the chamber's special committee on social security. Mr. Harriman is chairman of the board of the New England Power Association.

Samuel W. Reyburn, chairman, Associated Dry Goods Corporation and chairman of the Retail Merchants' Committee for the study of unemployment legislation.

William J. Graham, vice president, Equitable Assurance Society and member of the Actuarial Society of America.

Herman Feldman, professor of industrial relations at Amos Tuck School of Administration and Finance, Dartmouth College, and former chairman of the New Hampshire Commission on Unemployment Reserves.

Dr. Richard A. Lester, Princeton University economist.

Merryle Stanley Rukeyser, financial commentator, editorial writer, and author of four books on investment and personal finance. Mr. Rukeyser will serve as liaison officer between the Hearst newspapers and the commission.

The Nonpartisan Social Security Commission sponsored by the Hearst newspapers authorizes the subjoined statement of its views on reserves:

I. REDUCTION OF THE ACTUARIAL RESERVE

The commission believes that the cause of social security will be strengthened by amending the sections of the social security law dealing with reserves against old-age benefits. In providing for large actuarial reserves, the act needlessly borrows a principle from voluntary private insurance. The Government plan provides for the automatic inclusion in the insured group of young workers, and therefore can be safely financed without accumulating so large a fund as now provided.

No single phase of the legislation has caused more apprehension to the friends of the law than the proposed building up of an excessive governmental fund. Approach to the pay-as-you-go principle would enable the Government to deal more generously with those nearing the retirement age. At the same time, during the early years taxes on employers and employees could be held at a substantially lower level than contemplated.

Furthermore, these proposed changes in the financial basis for old-age benefits would involve a minimum of adjustment within the economic system, conforming more nearly to the realities. For pension payments to the aged would, in the nature of things, tend to constitute a charge on the current year's output of goods and services. Young and active workers, through the tax system, would consent to a deduction from their own production for the benefit of the aged, with the understanding that when they, too, reach the age of 65 they will be similarly provided for.

Accordingly, instead of the proposed reserve, which may reach $30,000,000,000 in 1960 and a contemplated maximum of $47,000,000,000 by 1980, the commission suggests a minimum contingency reserve no larger in amount than needed to assure carrying out of the plan even in years of depression, when tax receipts might be expected to be subnormal. Authorities consulted by the commission have suggested that $5,000,000,000 would probably be adequate as a contingency reserve for the next 25 years.

Sweden, after 24 years of experience with a national pension system and a comprehensive survey of the problem, completely abandoned the full-reserve principle at the beginning of the current year. These recommendations of the commission are not only consonant with the Swedish experience, but also with the trend in other principal nations carrying out social insurance projects.

The commission perceives hazards in the accumulation of a reserve of thirty, forty, or fifty billion dollars to be invested, as provided in the act, in Federal debt or federally guaranteed bonds in a manner that will yield at least 3 percent. Such a provision would tend to make increase in the Federal debt mandatory, and to that extent preclude the hope of a substantial net reduction of the national debt in periods of national prosperity.

The original argument used in behalf of the large fund was that interest-bearing Federal debt would in the later years provide 40 percent of the annual cost of old-age benefits. But provision of the interest would constitute a charge against taxpayers. Instead of this, if needed, such contributions could be taken directly out of general taxation.

Such a gigantic fund would be a constant temptation to reckless spenders in public office, and might be used in later years to keep a political party in power. Unless the Government spent the accumulated funds in such a way that the national income would be increased, the reserve would fail to perform an economic function.

A reserve as large as contemplated in the present provisions of the act tends to make the terms of social insurance rigid and inflexible, so that adjustments cannot readily be made to changes in the price level, the standard of living of the people, or the rate of industrial progress. It contemplates a static economic society and seeks to foreclose the right of the people periodically to review the plan in the light of economic and social change. Such rigidity is unrealistic, and political experience at home and abroad demonstrates that the lawmaking body in future years would object to having its hands tied.

The contemplated large reserve is to be accumulated by levying higher taxes and paying smaller benefits during the next few decades than would be necessary if such a reserve were not provided for. Accumulation of a large reserve could be obviated either by postponing the tax increases scheduled to begin in 1940, or by augmenting the benefit payments to those now of advanced age, so that each year most of the income from the current pay-roll taxes would be disbursed as benefits to retired workers who have reached the age of 65.

The Commission favors a combination of these two methods.

After sufficient experience, Congress can better decide how to offset the increasing annual disbursements without the present contemplated contribution of interest. If demands are to be made on the general taxpayer for contributions, such a change would be looked upon with more favor, if coverage is extended to exempted groups as rapidly as is administratively feasible.

II. INCREASE OF THE BENEFITS DURING IMMEDIATE FUTURE

Congress has already recognized that workers already old and nearing the retirement age will not have time to contribute in taxes the full cost of their benefits. Thus the principle has been adopted that others shall in taxes contribute to those now in the older groups. The Commission feels that this is a proper social policy, and in the circumstances thinks that such special situations might well be cared for out of general taxation, rather than exclusively out of pay-roll taxes. In any circumstances it recognizes a hardship in postponing benefits until 1942. Likewise, it considers the benefits provided by the present act in the early years as insufficient. Average benefits in the early years should be raised to a basis more nearly comparable to that provided in the act for those who would retire at 65, 25 years or 30 years hence. This sensible change will lessen the danger during the next two decades that might come to the act because benefits are low or not fairly comparable to benefits provided by noncontributory old-age assistance.

Such revisions would put social security on a stronger foundation and in turn relieve general taxation of the burden which otherwise would come through increased noncontributory old-age assistance. Whatever basic benefits it is found economically feasible to adopt on a broad national scale, it will be to the interest of employers, as well as workers, to consider voluntary pension plans, financed by employers and workers, as a supplement to the national project. The Commission recommends that employers and workers, through business management, labor unions, and other interested organizations, should give their prompt and serious attention to this problem.

The general taxpayer has a real stake in the social-security program, since, as the President's Committee on Economic Security computed in 1935, the successful operation of the old-age benefits program by 1980 should hold down public expenditures for old-age relief to less than 40 percent of the amount they would have reached by that date had the present contributory program not been established. A properly conceived social-insurance plan does not necessarily create new burdens on society but provides for a fairer and more systematic handling of old obligations.

III. PROTECTION OF PENSION FUNDS AND RESERVES

The Commission recommends that a definite accounting procedure be adopted by the Federal Government to earmark receipts intended for old-age benefits which exceed disbursements in any fiscal year. If pay-roll taxes exceed benefits and are used to meet expenses of the Federal Government or to retire outstanding debt, such sums should be definitely and clearly set up as liabilities in the financial statements of the Federal Government. There should be developed bookkeeping methods so that the people might visualize the mounting costs of old-age benefit payments assumed by the Federal Government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I also ask leave to insert in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a quotation from the New York Herald Tribune of this morning dealing with the Eccles statement which I was discussing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ON THE RECORD

By Dorothy Thompson

SANITY IN WASHINGTON

In the midst of the catcalls and mud slingings of the last few weeks a sober voice has at last spoken in Washington, and the voice is that of one of the ablest men in the administration, Mr. Marriner S. Eccles, Governor of the Federal Reserve System. Mr. Eccles said in effect precisely what Mr. Walter Lippmann expressed in his column some days ago, and which was the chief point of an address which the writer of this column made at the Harvard Club on Sunday. And that is that the immediate crisis which is upon us is not a crisis of Government failing to meet human needs, which, if they are not met, may precipitate revolution. The crisis is the serious danger of a price inflation which may sweep everything before it—workers and capital alike. That crisis is due to a combination of factors, of which this column has repeatedly warned; the international situation, and a vast artificial boom based upon prodigious expenditures for armaments which threaten to unbalance budgets and create currency crises throughout Europe, with inevitable repercussions here; sudden and universal demands of labor for shorter hours and higher wages, with the assumption of no responsibility for seeing that production is not thereby curtailed; the intention of capital to pass these increases on to the public in the form of higher prices, even when such are not economically necessary. Inflation occurs when expenditures are being made more rapidly than real wealth is being produced. It is just as simple as that.

Mr. Eccles points, in addition, to one other thing: A labor shortage. "Numerically", he said, "there are still millions of unemployed people able and willing to work, and several more millions engaged on public works who could be diverted from public to private pay rolls." On which one can only comment that Mr. Eccles should have a word with Mr. Hopkins, who recently urged that the W. P. A. be put on a permanent basis, a proposal heartily hailed by the 20 eastern mayors who met in Philadelphia and thought it could be nicely done for $2,200,000,000 a year. A mere bagatelle of about a third of the annual Budget and a thirtieth of the total national income. Mr. Hopkins' argument is that there is a permanent technological unemployment in the United States, and millions of people who cannot work in productive fields for other reasons. Indeed, the whole relief policy has gone on the assumption of a permanent large-scale unemployment and the effect of that policy has been to withdraw millions of men from the production of wealth and create an artificial labor shortage.

Mr. Eccles also puts his finger on another serious trouble with our productive system, namely, the fact that in craft after craft skilled men cannot be found to fill the jobs; it is nearly a year since this column pointed to the pressing need for a large-scale apprentice system. But that has been combated not only by employers but most vigorously by trade unions. Mr. Eccles warns the unions that they must abandon monopolistic labor practices. Some of the old-line craft unions have been the worst possible sinners in this respect. To take a couple of examples at random: The stage hands union charges a huge membership fee—$1,000, I believe—and admits no new members anyhow. The theater designers' union charges $500 and is harder to get into than the Century Club.

Mr. Eccles' statement treads on a lot of toes. He doesn't whitewash the industries either. He says that price increases have been decree which are not justified by rising wage or raw-material costs. One can guess that steel, copper, and other metals fall into this category.

There is small comfort in his speech for the reactionaries. The Budget, he says, has got to be balanced, and balanced promptly, and we have got to begin to retire the public debt by the Government, in relation to the expansion of private credit. He is not in favor, however, of balancing the Budget at the expense of the destitute and those who really cannot find private employment, but by increased taxation. This column believes that our relief policy needs a thorough investigation and overhauling by a nonpartisan commission, a proposal which has been made several times to the Government, but consistently rejected. We need to find out what our relief needs really are, and we undoubtedly must face further taxation in any case.

There are some people in this country who think we can, through the increased powers of the Federal Reserve Board, manage credit and manipulate the money market so as to avoid inflation. Mr. Eccles scotches that vain hope. "If stable recovery is endangered by unwarranted price and cost increases arising from nonmonetary causes, they must be combated by other than monetary means."

Now is the time for all good men to come to the aid of their—country. There is a way out if both the James Rands and the John Lewises will see a little light.

As for the radicals, or those who call themselves "liberals", there was a sobering word from France yesterday, also—from the popular front government, headed by the Socialist, Leon Blum. There the Minister of National Economy, Spinasse, who is one of the closest associates of M. Blum, has warned employers and employees that they can keep the 40-hour week only if they can do so without decreasing production and increasing prices. And the 48-hour week has been resumed in some industries.

Mr. Eccles has established a refreshing contact again with a few realities.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senate.

REGULATION OF RADIO COMMUNICATION

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the pendency in the other body of the Congress of a resolution authorizing an investigation of various phases of the radio industry, and reports that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, contemplates the introduction of a resolution of similar purpose, prompt me to bring to the attention of the Senate some of the principles and policies embodied in existing law, to summarize the present facts which have relation to these declared policies, and to voice my approval of a congressional survey of law and facts, that we may more wisely consider what the public interest in this field of communication is, whether present law rightly declares this public interest and is calculated to serve it, and whether the Federal Communications Commission is respecting the law and in its administration is furthering its interest, or is heedless of the congressional purpose.

I shall endeavor to make my statement factual, seeking to avoid dogmatic expression of opinion. This purpose is not because of a want of views, but springs from an unwillingness to freeze these opinions now through premature and positive assertion. This whole subject is of such consequence to all our people that it merits open-minded reexamination. To this the Senate should, in my judgment, address itself.

It is in the broadcast band that the public has the greatest interest. We may properly regard the radio spectrum, and in particular that part of it reserved for broadcasting use, as a natural resource, possessing great availability for mass communication, and for the instruction and entertainment of the American people. There are physical limitations upon the number of available channels within this broadcast band. Because this is so, each channel has great possibilities of usefulness. There is a resulting responsibility resting upon the Congress to see to it that the largest possible benefit to all our people follows from the use of each of these channels, and there is an obligation to make certain that the public interest in them is not subordinated to private advantage.

By the Radio Act of 1927 Congress set up a Radio Commission. Under the act of 1934 this Commission was merged into the Federal Communications Commission. There was imposed upon this Commission the obligation of carrying out the congressional purpose as declared in the 1934 act. The 1934 act, so far as concerns radio, was a reenactment of the 1927 act, with only slight change. There was a rearrangement of sections, and there was a change in the provisions relating to court procedure, but there were no other changes of substance from the earlier act which need here to be noted.

The 1927 act was pioneering legislation. For the first time it declared certain definite principles with respect to radio communication, and asserted the possession by the Federal Government of definite rights in and powers over this field of communication.

It is important to an understanding of the matters to which I shall hereafter refer to point out now certain of these principles and of these rights and powers.

PRINCIPLES OF 1927 AND 1934 ACTS—NO ABSOLUTE RIGHT TO BROADCAST

The 1927 act rejected the previous rule of the 1912 act that there was a mandatory obligation resting on the licensing authority to issue a broadcasting license to each applicant therefor, and asserted instead that the right to transmit by radio was at the most a qualified or conditional right, to be exercised only upon a finding that the granting of a license and the operating of the station would serve a public convenience or interest or meet a public necessity. The same principle is asserted in the 1934 act.

NO PRIVATE OWNERSHIP OF FREQUENCY

The 1927 act declared that it was its purpose to maintain control by the United States over all channels of foreign and interstate radio transmission, to provide for the use of such channels by licensees for limited periods of time, but to permit of no ownership of these channels by any individual or corporation. It sought through many provisions to secure this governmental control; to prevent the assertion of private ownership; and, above all, to deny that the licensed use of a frequency for a defined period could ripen into a vested right therein. It declared in terms that no license should create any right beyond the terms, conditions, and period of the license.

The act forbade the issuance of a license unless the applicant signed a waiver of any claim to the use of any frequency or of the ether against the regulatory power of the United States because of the previous use of the same. The act declared that the station license should not vest in the licensee any right to operate the station, or any right in the use of the frequency designated in the license beyond the terms thereof, or in any other manner than authorized therein.

These provisions were an effort by the Congress to accomplish these announced ends, and in particular to prevent a prior use becoming the foundation of a claim of legal or equitable right in a frequency as against the power of control and regulation asserted to be in the Government. First carried in the 1927 act they were reenacted in the 1934 act.

LIMITED TERMS OF LICENSES

Congress also, in the 1927 act, placed a definite limit upon the permitted term of any license. It further prohibited the transfer or the assignment in any manner of a station license or the frequency authorized to be used without the consent in writing of the licensing authority. The purpose of these restrictive provisions as to the term of a license and as to its assignment is clear. They were intended to be effective aids in the plan of control by the Government. Congress did not propose that in a rapidly changing art, in a field of great public importance, it should lose for any long period of time that power which inheres in the right to license or to withhold a license. Congress sought also to make certain by these provisions, and by others, that in addition to technical considerations the citizenship, the character, the financial, and other qualifications of an applicant for a license or for the assignment of a license should be taken into account by the Commission in determining whether an original licensee or whether a proposed assignee possessed the qualifications of a licensee. These provisions and this purpose of the 1927 act are likewise found in the 1934 act.

MONOPOLY GUARDED AGAINST

Congress was also gravely concerned, when the 1927 act was under consideration, that this means of communication and of public information should not become monopolized.

The provisions of law already alluded to guarded in some measure against this result. Congress, in addition, wrote into the 1927 act further express language designed to make impossible monopolistic control of this form of communication. It authorized the licensing authority to impose upon any licensee any of the terms, conditions, or restrictions authorized to be imposed with respect to submarine cable licenses by section 2 of the Cable Landing License Act of 1921. This section gave to the President authority to grant or to withhold a landing license upon such terms as would assure just and reasonable rates and service and as would make certain that a licensee gave no exclusive right of landing or of operation.

This 1927 act in terms made all laws of the United States relating to unlawful restraints and monopolies, and to combinations, contracts, or agreements in restraint of trade, applicable to the manufacture of, the sale of, and trade in radio apparatus entering into and affecting interstate or foreign commerce, or interstate or foreign radio communications. And it further provided that if a licensee should be found guilty in any such respect the court, in addition to other penalties imposed by law, might order the revocation of the license held by the guilty party.

The 1927 legislation also directed the licensing authority to refuse a station license to any person found guilty of monopolizing or attempting to monopolize radio communication, directly or indirectly, through control of the manufacture or sale of radio apparatus, through exclusive traffic arrangements, or by any other means, or to have been guilty of using unfair methods of competition.

This same legislation prohibited combinations between radio and wire companies if the purpose or effect thereof would be to lessen competition in the communication field.

Another section of the 1927 law sought to make certain that there should be such a distribution of licenses, of power, of frequencies, and of time as to assure to all the States and the communities thereof efficient and equitable service. This provision is likewise to be found in the 1934 act.

THREE PRINCIPAL EVILS GUARDED AGAINST

In these provisions of law thus summarized three general principles and purposes to which I now call the attention of the Senate in somewhat more detail were of outstanding significance.

NO VESTED RIGHTS

Of first importance is the principle that the licensing of a station and of the right to use a designated frequency therein should not create a vested right in the license or in the frequency. The purpose of Congress was that the licensee should not, by virtue of his license, acquire a property right which could be asserted against the Government. It must be recognized that if the use of a frequency brings substantial profit to the licensee there is increased difficulty in maintaining the principle that there is no property right vested in the holder of the license.

In the next place, it must be recognized that if a license and the use of a frequency bring to a licensee substantial income, even though the physical investment of the licensee may not be great, the task of the regulatory body is more burdensome, for however little contribution a particular station owned by any given person and located in a particular area may make to an orderly and efficient radio service throughout the United States, which is the great end sought, or however such station may interfere with a greater public service, the fact of the investment and the fact of the profits of very necessity embarrass the Commission in dealing with that station, either upon a requested renewal of license or with respect to other action affecting it.

This suggests the question, What are the revenues and the profits of radio licensees? I present to the Senate a general statement as to them. Much of this material comes from a survey of broadcasting revenues made by the United States Census Bureau for the year 1935. The figures given are based on data furnished by 561 out of the 564 stations engaged in commercial broadcasting in that year. The report is probably the most accurate source of information now generally available. This report shows that for the year 1935 the total revenue of these stations was $86,492,000, of which more than 92 percent came from the sale of time. The balance came from the sale of talent and miscellaneous items. Of the portion received from the sale of time, approximately one-half, $39,737,000, was received from national regional network advertising.

From compilations published by the National Association of Broadcasters other interesting statistical matter may be gleaned. This source indicates that the gross revenue of the broadcasting industry for 1936 was $107,550,000. There are estimates by others that the gross revenue for 1937 will total from $125,000,000 to $135,000,000. This is a huge revenue based upon a relatively small capital investment.

Complete and trustworthy information as to the profits made by broadcasting stations is not available. In the renewal applications filed every 6 months by the licensees, they are asked to furnish their average monthly revenue and their average monthly profits. If complete answers to these questions were insisted upon, and if uniform methods of accounting were required, the Commission could readily provide this information; but my understanding is that there has been no serious effort to secure the information or to compile and analyze it.

It has been reported to me that from the last set of renewal applications it appears that the highest average monthly revenue received by any station of the local class, that is, stations with night power of 100 watts or less, was $14,000, or $168,000 a year; that in the regional class of stations, that is, stations with night power of 1 kilowatt or less, the highest annual revenue was $911,000, and the highest profit was $244,000. Data as to the average profits in this group are not available to me. Incomplete figures have also been compiled for the 50-kilowatt clear-channel stations. Eight of these stations owned or leased by the National Broadcasting Co., or by the Columbia Broadcasting System, have not submitted separate figures to the Commission. The 24 other stations of this power show an average annual revenue of $700,000 and an average annual profit of $280,000.

One station in this group showed an annual profit of about $620,000. There is one station of 500 kilowatts. Its annual revenue is reported to be over $2,400,000, and its profit somewhere between $357,000 and $420,000. Many factors enter into the earnings of these stations. The results are not dependent wholly upon the power of the station or any other single factor.

The rates charged by stations are a matter of interest. Information on this subject is furnished in a publication called Standard Rate and Data Service. The general practice is to regard a one-quarter hour period at night as the basic rate period. Rates vary greatly, from a few dollars for some of the local stations to very substantial sums. The charges in the case of the 50-kilowatt clear-channel stations range from $85 to $370 for one-quarter hour of time. The average in this group is about $175 for this length of time. The highest charge of which I have knowledge is at the rate of $532 for one-quarter hour of time.

The costs of the stations earning the revenues and the profits indicated vary greatly. In a report made by a group of experts, and published under the auspices of the National Advisory Council on Radio in Education, are to be found estimates of the capital investment involved in stations using various amounts of power. These estimates are as follows:

One-hundred-watt station, $6,600; 1-kilowatt station, $30,000; 5-kilowatt station, $63,000; 50-kilowatt station, $224,000; 500-kilowatt station, $582,000.

These figures do not include studios, studio equipment, and real estate. The omitted items will aggregate in many instances substantial amounts, but they will not change the fact of very large profits, in many cases of 100 percent and more annually, upon the investment.

The rates charged by these broadcasting stations are not subject to Federal regulation. In the 1927 act there was a provision that a license should be revocable by the Commission if it was found that any licensee had made any unjust or unreasonable charge, or had been guilty of any discrimination with respect to communications or service. This provision was not carried in the 1934 act, and the latter act in terms declared that a broadcasting station was not a common carrier.

Such figures as I have just presented suggest that an inquiry should be made into the radio industry in order that the Congress may have complete knowledge as to the investment in radio stations and their equipment; as to profits; as to the real considerations for the sale, assignment, and leasing of stations; as to whether licensees are receiving huge sums for licenses which cost them nothing; and generally into the basic question of whether property rights in the nature of vested rights are being asserted in frequencies and are being recognized by the Commission. Other questions immediately suggest themselves. If huge profits are being made from an investment relatively small as compared with the profits, and if they come from the use of a natural resource in which the user has no title or right of use beyond that granted by the Government, may we not properly ask whether, in the circumstances, the profits to which I have made general reference are not unreasonable?

If this appears to be true, then may we not properly question whether the rates charged should not be regulated by public authority, or whether the profits should not be devoted in larger measure to an improved service, or whether a portion thereof should not be recaptured to meet the costs of governmental regulation?

The facts now available make it advisable in my view that thoughtful consideration should be given to the particular question, among others, whether these stations, with their large revenues and profits, their wide variations in charge, with the limited frequencies available, with the tendency toward centralization hereafter discussed, and with their great usefulness and interest to the public, should not be declared to be public utilities and be subjected to a control in rates and practices to which they are not now amenable. That there would be legal justification for such a classification I believe is clear. A business carried on under a grant of privilege from the State has imposed upon it by reason of that privilege a definite duty of rendering a public service; and the power of regulation must exist if there is to be assurance that this public-service obligation will be met.

The classification of these stations as public utilities, and the assertion of control over their rates and practices, as to the wisdom of which there would be differences of thought, is complicated, and is made more difficult by the extent to which stations are now owned by newspapers. No one would think of asserting public control over the rates and practices of the press. It might, however, prove impossible to separate the radio station and all its activities and financial relationships from its newspaper ownership.

Such ownership has become extensive. It is not, however, new. In the earliest lists of broadcast stations were found instances of such ownership. Some of these licensees were pioneers in radio broadcasting. In 1926, of the 268 principal stations, 35 were owned and operated by newspapers and other publications. It has recently been reported that newspapers own or control 150 stations. My information is that the number so owned or controlled is 194. A superficial analysis indicates that about 98 are separately owned by 98 publishers, and that the remaining 96 are owned or controlled by 30 publishers, each having from 2 to 10 stations. Since January 15, the date to which the figures I have just given relate, other applications have been granted, and still others are pending. There seems to be a definite and accelerated movement toward newspaper ownership of stations. The latter fact probably accounts for the belief held by some, and now often given voice, that radio broadcasting and the press—the two great agencies now available for the dissemination of news and knowledge—should not be united in single ownership and control, but should be maintained as distinct if not competitive sources of information.

It is not by any means clear what has created the public interest in this subject, or on what grounds the opposition to this joint ownership rests. Three principal reasons are assigned for the present hostility to this joint control:

In the first instance, it is said to be due to a definite disagreement on the part of many with the public policy of the particular newspaper ownership controlling the largest number of stations. While expressed generally, it may well be single and personal in its purpose.

In the second place, it has been asserted that the opposition to this newspaper ownership is chargeable to the two largest networks or chains, which are moved, so it has been suggested, by the hope that the issue thus raised will divert attention from their own acquisition of stations and from their growing domination of the broadcast field, and also by the fear that newspaper acquisition of stations threatened the completeness and the effectiveness of this chain control.

Finally, a substantial reason for the concern which is being expressed is alleged to be the belief of many that it is not sound public policy to give to a single agency the present two means of reaching the ear of the American public.

Those holding this view urge that the sure guaranty of a free press is competition between newspapers; that free speech by radio is dependent upon competitive opportunities between radio stations; and that full opportunity to reach the public by both means is best assured by competition between stations and press.

The growth of newspaper investment in radio stations has some possibilities which publishers themselves might well explore. To whatever extent the capital of the newspaper owner goes into radio, it becomes subject to business risks not elsewhere encountered. It is invested in chief reliance upon a license which may not exceed the term of 3 years, and which in custom is for 6 months, a license which is not renewable as a matter of right and which may be revoked in appropriate circumstances. Clearly, here is an unusual monetary risk; but of greater significance is the fact, which cannot be ignored, that as the newspaper investment increases, the press becomes increasingly susceptible to governmental influence. The press of America should consider the implications involved. It is not unreasonable to fear that the development of newspaper ownership in this governmentally controlled means of communication is the great threat to the freedom of the press in America.

That a problem is presented by the present situation and by the trend of the times ought to be recognized by all. If the Commission senses the situation, and if it has views as to what our policy should be, it has skillfully concealed the fact from Congress. Congress ought no longer to ignore this problem. If it approves what is taking place, all is well; but if the conclusion is that the control of press and radio by a single interest is unsound, Congress must move with celerity or a situation will have been created with which it will be too late to cope.

TRAFFIC IN LICENSES AND FREQUENCIES

Somewhat intimately connected with the matters just discussed is the question of the sale and lease of stations and the assignment of licenses and frequencies. These changes in ownership or in control are effected either by sale of the physical property, by assignments of the licenses, or sometimes by leases.

There was in 1927 great controversy as to the proper term of a license. When the original act was under consideration there was serious contention that if investments were to be made and the art was to be developed licenses must be for much longer periods than those permited by the present statute and those granted by the Commission. A much shorter period, however, than that originally proposed was written into the law. This was done to assure flexibility in the broadcasting system and to aid in effective control by the regulatory body. It is made clear by the provisions of law referred to in the early part of these remarks that Congress intended that there should be definite control over the ownership and operation of stations and over the assignments of licenses. It was recognized that freedom to barter and sell licenses threatened the principle that only those who would render a public service should enjoy a station license. But notwithstanding determined effort by the Congress so to control ownership and the sale and assignment of station licenses and frequencies, the practice has grown to such an extent that we are almost justified in the fear that there has been in large degree a failure in the congressional purpose. Not only are stations being often sold and licenses assigned but prices are being paid which clearly indicate that the assignee is buying a frequency rather than physical property.

Between July 11, 1934, and June 30, 1935, the Commission approved 25 assignments of licenses and 10 transfers of control of licensee corporations. During the period from July 1, 1935, to December 8, 1936, 36 assignments of licenses and 31 transfers of control of licensee corporations were approved. In addition, there were a number of assignments based upon the leasing of stations. There were other instances where substantial stock transfers in corporations took place. One cannot be quite certain what in any case the substantial effect was of such stock sales.

As bearing on the question of whether licenses and frequencies are being trafficked in, the facts in particular cases are significant. So far as my information goes, the highest price paid in any transaction approved by the Commission since July 11, 1934, was $1,250,000. This amount was paid by the Columbia Broadcasting system to stockholders of a California corporation for the capital stock of that corporation. This transaction was approved July 17, 1936, after a hearing. According to the information at hand, the replacement cost of the physical assets of this corporation was $217,000, and the claimed value of the assets, including physical and intangible assets, was $236,000. Of this amount, $61,000 was claimed as goodwill. Ninety thousand dollars was represented by accounts receivable. There was $22,000 in cash, and the depreciated value of the physical property was only $63,000. The price paid for the stock of this corporation, therefore, was nearly 20 times the present value of the physical property. This information is taken from the Commission's written decision approving the transfer. This in its essence was a sale of a frequency and the recognition by the Commission that the frequency had a value to the parties of approximately a million dollars.

There are other cases where huge prices were paid. The most recent instance of a sale involving a large figure has to do with a station in Texas. In this case the Columbia Broadcasting system is endeavoring to purchase a radio station for a net price of $825,000, of which a substantial part must have been for the frequency. Some $500,000 more was to be paid for other property of the corporation. The original cost of this station was $236,000. Its replacement cost new was $232,000, and its depreciated value based on inspection and appraisal was $141,000. The application for approval was heard by one of the Commission's examiners in December. The examiner recommended against approval of the transfer. Exceptions were filed by the parties, and the matter has never been passed on as yet by the Commission. This price can only be explained on the theory that it was in large measure based upon a value in the frequency involved.

It should be noted that in a large proportion of these cases involving assignment and transfer of control the commissioners granted the applications without hearing. During the month of December, while this Texas case was being heard and while a substantial controversy raged about it, transfer of control in another licensee corporation, this one a small regional station, was granted without hearing. In the Broadcasting Magazine for January 1, 1937, is to be found information regarding this transaction. The aggregate price for the station's stock was $340,000. Considering the size of the station, this price may easily represent as great a discrepancy between it and the value of the physical assets as appears in either the California or Texas case. Some of these assignments and transfers granted raise not only questions as to the price asked and the justification therefor but they also involve the wisdom of allowing stations to move from smaller cities and towns to centers of population where there is already station congestion.

I have referred to sales and to assignments. Another ingenious practice by which the radio properties are dealt with has grown up. The leasing of stations presents an interesting situation. There have been of late a number of leases of stations for terms of years with options covering such further periods as to make the total of time as high as 20 years. Station WMAL here in Washington is a case in point. The lessor is a local corporation, the M. A. Leese Radio Corporation. The licensee is the National Broadcasting Co. The claimed value of the physical and intangible assets is $37,599, but the lessee pays an annual rental of $36,000, which is only about $1,599 less than the value of the assets leased. The licensee of the Communications Commission, as I have said, is the N. B. C., and the licensee is being granted successive renewals by the Commission. The Leese Radio Corporation is not the licensee, but it is being paid a rental amounting to many times the value of the assets covered by the lease. Manifestly the N. B. C. is not paying annually $36,000 for the rental of assets of the value of $37,599. Clearly the Leese Corporation is being paid for the use of a frequency, and yet in this case it is not even a licensee.

In Boston is station WEEI. It is leased by the Columbia Broadcasting system from the former lessee. The lease runs from August 1, 1936, to April 1, 1943, a longer period than any broadcast license may be issued for. It was, nevertheless, approved by the Commission. The total claimed value of the physical and intangible assets is stated to be $497,907. The annual rental is $219,000, and this is only a regional station. In 7 years' time the Columbia system will pay the lessor $1,533,000, or, roughly, three times the value of the physical and intangible assets covered by the lease. Here again who can question that a frequency has been leased for a 7-year period with the assent of the Commission?

Why should the Government be concerned? The price paid cannot affect the legal powers of the Commission. In a legal sense a station licensee who has paid a huge sum for an assignment, a sale, or a lease, and who has violated the law is as subject to the penalty of revocation or to the rejection of a renewal application as is one paying a nominal consideration, but I am afraid the human element enters into the equation and punitive action is not so certain in the one case as in the other.

If we will regard the realities, we will recognize that, in disregard of the congressional purpose, stations and licenses and frequencies are being freely bought and sold and leased; that prices are being asked and paid which have no possible relation to the investment, and which can only be explained upon the theory that the frequency is being highly capitalized.

There are involved other questions upon which I have not touched. I have said enough, I believe, to justify a congressional inquiry into this subject matter. The questions raised are of principle. Did Congress declare sound policy in the 1927 legislation? If not, let us make further effort to find the solid ground upon which this industry and its regulation should rest. I do not view with complaisance administrative disregard of congressional purpose. One or the other attitude should be changed.

MONOPOLY

The third major problem dealt with by the Congress in the legislation referred to was monopoly. There cannot be the slightest doubt that Congress undertook to make certain that undue concentration of stations in particular areas should not be permitted and that there should not be monopoly ownership or control of radio.

I make but passing reference to the subject of concentration of stations. This evil was sought to be effectively guarded against by the 1927 act and by the Davis amendment, so-called, of 1928. This amendment was repealed because of criticisms directed at the technical difficulties it presented and because of the oft-repeated assurance that the language of the 1927 act, found also in the 1934 act, made clear the congressional purpose and clothed the Commission with the necessary authority. Some heed has been given by the regulatory body to this purpose, but there are repeated warnings in the acts of the Commission that it is not greatly impressed with the desirability or necessity of observance of this congressional direction.

Study of the facts with respect to ownership and control of stations brings the conviction that Congress must either recede from its position of hostility to monopoly or it must take steps to insure that its wishes be respected by the regulatory body.

The provisions of the 1927 act, which are also found in the 1934 act, leave no possibility of doubt as to the will of Congress; they confer ample powers to make that will effective.

What are the facts with respect to competition in this industry? Or asked another way, What are the facts with respect to the control of this industry by a few? I confine myself only to the broadcasting branch of communications.

There are today about 685 broadcasting licenses, including construction permits. There are 90 channels or frequencies within the broadcast band. Of these, 40 are so-called cleared channels.

Of the total number of stations, more than one-half are stations of low power or stations with such limitation of hours of operation as to be of minor importance. There are about 250 stations, perhaps a few more, either on full time or with substantial power, making up that part of our broadcasting system to which the greater part of our people regularly listen. Of this number about 240 are owned or are in some way tied in with the three principal chains, the National Broadcasting Co., Columbia, and the Mutual Broadcasting systems.

The National Broadcasting Co. actually owns or controls 17 stations and exercises effective control over the programs of about 87 other stations. The Columbia system owns or controls 9, and has a dominating influence over the programs of approximately 98 others. These numbers alone have significance, but the size and character of the stations emphasize the importance of this ownership or control, for these 26 stations use 20½ of the 40 cleared channels available, and they are largely stations with 50-kilowatt power. Only two of the stations owned or controlled by N. B. C. are not clear-channel stations; only three of those owned by Columbia are not cleared-channel stations.

Now this control of this number of stations operating on clear channels with 50-kilowatt power means that two organizations, with headquarters in New York, determine the character of information going to a substantial part of the people of this country, both urban and rural. With the exception of about 3 stations, all of the 26 mentioned by me have been acquired under the authority of the Commission since 1927. The process of centralized control is going on. The independent stations are becoming relatively, if not actually, fewer. Is the Congress interested in the process? If it is, I again urge that it investigate and study the facts and the implications thereof.

The Congress at the time the 1927 act was passed, while, perhaps, not fully appreciating the growth of the chain system, did recognize the possibilities of the situation and wrote into this early act the authority to make special regulations applicable to radio stations engaged in chain broadcasting. This provision was continued in the 1934 act. The regulating body has seemed indifferent to the problem or without definite views concerning it.

In November 1935 one of the Commissioners—and I do not get the information from him—presented a motion in a meeting of the Commission directing the Broadcast Division to report to the Commission: (a) Whether, in its opinion, the Commission should adopt special regulations for the regulation of chain broadcasting; and (b) in the event that the adoption of such special regulation is believed by that division to be desirable, the proposed text of such regulations.

This motion was referred to the Broadcast Division for consideration and report. There has been no report. Nothing appears to indicate that the problem has been considered, notwithstanding its overwhelming importance.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

I do not want to reflect unwarrantably upon any member of this Commission. In past years I have given much attention to the problems presented and have some appreciation of the difficulties inherent in the situation. I feel justified, however, in general comments on the Commission's work.

In the first instance, every Senator knows that the air is full of reports that cases have been decided not alone on the evidence presented and the merits of the issue, but that political pressure has been often exerted, and that it has been determinative in many instances. There is, I believe, a public impression that applicants before the Commission should and must seek political aid. The Commission ought not to be subjected to such influences. Its decisions ought not to be under suspicion to the extent they now are because this or the other person of political power has intervened. I know of no more certain means of reestablishing the Commission in public respect than to turn on the light of publicity and thereby to stop these attempts to improperly influence a quasi-judicial and regulatory body of the Government.

There is persistent report that the Commission, in the consideration of cases and in the determination thereof, disregards its own procedural rules and its established engineering standards. Is this true? If there is justification for the belief, what is the justification for the Commission's acts?

There is a greater volume and persistence of criticism of this Commission than of any other bureau or commission of the Government. Is there warrant for this? I think the Congress should free the Commission from unjustified suspicion or it should act if its policies and purposes and the standards which ought to guide a regulatory body of the public importance of this Commission are being disregarded. Only a searching inquiry will give the answer to these questions.

Scientists tell us we are on the threshold of great events in radio. New bands are to be available in what are termed the "ultra high frequencies." The practical use of television is believed to be at hand. The possibilities of the future are beyond our knowledge. It is certain that governmental regulation cannot be dispensed with. Regulation must be dictated by sound principles, so far as these are known, and by a body whose acts shall be guided by a sense of public responsibility and by an independence which is deaf to every political and other unworthy suggestion.

Mr. President, I join in the hope which has been expressed by others that there may be investigation of this entire subject matter.

SIT-DOWN STRIKES

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I desire to occupy just a minute to issue a feeble warning, so far as lies within my power.

The most ominous thing in our national economic life today is the sit-down strike. It is bad for the Government, and in the long run it is worse for labor. If the sit-down strike is carried on with the connivance or the sympathy of the public authorities, then the warning signals are out, and down that road lurks a dictatorship.

NEED FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION TO SETTLE STRIKES

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senate for a few moments upon a subject which I think is justifying very grave consideration. I wish to propound a query to the Senate. I put it as a member of this official family: Is the United States a government?

We recall, sir, that the great Bard has Macduff to come upon the field in an hour of great confusion and insurrection among Scotsmen demanding:

Stands Scotland where it did?

We ask, Stands the United States where it should?

Is this Government to continue apparently unobserving an attitude throughout the Republic of America where indiscriminate paralysis of every form of business is being incited and every relation of commerce dismembered under the name of a controversy between employer and employee? Are we to be lifeless until this predicament shall lead to lawlessness that shall take the form of an abolition of the status of peace and destruction of the known rights of property? Are we to assist in stifling the just privileges of the toiler? Are we waiting to be driven into a national confusion that may lead to national riots?

Does this honorable body forget that the circumstances surrounding us now are but repetition? When a situation similar to that now surrounding us prevailed—like unto this in great degree—under Theodore Roosevelt, known as the anthracite coal strike of 1902, and that which led from it, does the Senate forget that it was that President who felt it was within his power, with the approval of Members of this body on both sides, to name a commission of trustworthy men to give the general subject attention, and thus give voice to all those who were making contentions and claims by which they could be heard, some solution be reached, some composure afforded to business and industry in the country? Will we not recall that when, in the railroad strike of 1916, there was the threat, sir, of a desolation and a devastation here in this land under Wilson, he put afoot a movement of investigation by authority by which subsequently the result of lawlessness and riot was avoided, and the danger to the point of destruction of both law and order and the high status of America before the world was avoided?

None of us can forget, sir, that under Grover Cleveland conditions of unrest reached a very high point in the Debs strike, and the State which I have the honor in part to represent became, unhappily, the field of strife where followed the destruction of property, incendiarism, and the murder of men, until our United States were held up before the world as a land of such lawlessness, strife, and crime as to be unworthy of being continued under the Constitution.

Mr. President, that which has been may be. "A sputtering flame may set the house afire", saith the old adage, and destroy the city and all its associations of family and home.

Mr. President, the time has come, as I behold it, when our honorable President would be justified, upon any action taken by this honorable body, in suggesting that we behold the situation as of concern to the Republic, not from the standpoint of the Constitution or the line of demarcation between the Federal Government and the States—those abstract doctrines which have oftentimes wooed us to confusion—but because the right of peace, the security of honest property, the preservation of the Federal Government call for action on the part of men of will and conscience necessary, sir, in the fulfillment of their duty to American citizenship.

Sir, if conditions as we now see them shall continue, what will be the result? If these strikes and protests against any and every form of order in society and Government shall reach the point where men shall possess the courthouses, the instruments of the law, and by their numbers and force shall circumvent the due processes of a peaceful government, what will be the end? Both sides will soon enter into the strife, and the final result will be an assault upon every form of peaceful government in America and the defeat of every right of honest toil. Note, sirs, that at such times there always wait those ready to take up the conflict in confusion and carry it on to the result of despotism or destruction.

Does this honorable body need to be reminded that if there are such instruments as Hitler and Mussolini in the full meaning of what is charged now and then, and from certain sources has been demonstrated, it came about as follows: First, we will contemplate Mussolini. The strikes came in Italy. Then the toilers took possession of the plants of fabrication and manufacture. Then the masters of the plants, seeing their opportunity, stood behind those who foraged upon the property and seized it with force. These owners aided the assailants to the point where every form of republican government and every method of democracy was overcome. Now, sirs, it was from such condition that there sprung that which we speak of as Mussolini and his era. His influence was by reason of these financial and material interests standing behind him and guiding him to the destruction of individual rights and the lifting up and the sustaining of an imperial power in behalf of the strike and the property.

Sir, do we forget that in Germany the labor movement had proceeded and reached the highest degree of efficiency? No greater personal liberty existed among men than that which they enjoyed. A form of philosophy in government was their inheritance. A sweet and beautiful theme in all forms of literature, and that which impelled people of the highest degree of refinement, was that of the Germans.

But, sir, there came a time when communism within slipped through its gliding menace, and there, like a writhing serpent, coiled itself around the circumstance; and when it did, it awakened the toiler to turn on himself, attack all of that which was peace, destroy all property which was available to his hand, and assert power within himself to do so with perfect indifference to the institutions of authority called government. Then, sir, from time to time, in one form or the other, one man pursuing after the other, Mr. Hitler arose. He had had to do with housepainting down in a small town near Munich; and he passed into Munich as the head of one of his agencies, and from that became an assertive power with a great deal of strength in the will of what he felt were the privileges of those who are favored in position. Very shortly the same financiers, the masters of great commerce, those who manipulated wealth as under Mussolini in Italy, got behind Hitler in the very same manner that had preceded in the case of Mussolini. They aided Hitler with funds and guided him with their strength to power. This was to aid his regime to obtain control of government and to assure the monopoly of their privileges without hindrance. Unhappily for the toilers, they, seeing this prospect, as they fancied, as one in their behalf, joined in the undertaking. The result followed. The toiler lost his individual liberty, the property of the laborer became sacrificed and confiscated along with that of the proprietor to the demands of tyranny and power from capital and military. The final result is that there is no more in these countries the old government of liberty and democracy of their fathers.

We turn to Russia for a moment. We contemplate Spain in the whole picture of its darkness and lurid flame. Can we do this and yet learn nothing? Will this Government wait until the like proceeding has gone so far in this our land, without protest or warning, as to reach the point where we must be terrorized by one or the other, the tyrant who shall take charge of government in the hour that awaits him, or the imperial power of government under military power to avoid it?

We sit silent here, honorable Members of a great body, the great, leading authorities of the Government, indifferent to what all of this threatens us with. No one seemingly is interested to avoid the sure consequences. Among my brethren of this honorable body, hear your humble servant as he proclaims that in every hour and condition such as now surrounds this our Government there waits another Hitler and there lurks in the shadows another Mussolini. It is but a matter of time when, opportunity giving them their chance, it will be availed of, and behind them the toilers, the misguided power, following upon the dream of benefit; and the calculating master, seeing it to be his hour, will, in conjunction, work to the confiscation of the rights of man, order the death and the destruction of liberty, and for all time of the generation overturn every form of government. This master secret power, never courageous, never standing out in his own character, chooses those of humbler station, and appears to be elevating them into the glory of greatness, that they may lead the thing which profits him.

Mr. President, this our Government has an hour when it must turn now to realize the situation. Let us use the index. If at the city of Detroit, Mich., as is now reported, there is a move afoot to seize the courts and to prevent the executive and judicial officers from carrying out their orders, and if, on the other hand, there is on the part of great masters a threatened combination to starve out the toiler, by which he can neither take water nor food if he dares sit in the premises, and then the two shall clash against each other, with the victory going to him who shall have the greatest force of numbers to sustain his undertaking, what is to become of America? Are we to wait until these things shall have set upon us, with their awful consequences, before there shall be some course of action, some show of courage, to avoid it?

I rise at this moment, sir, as a citizen of America, as one of this administration, as one more hopeful for my country, to invite attention to the fact that all of that which has been all around us, with the results of destruction that we have seen, with that sure devastation that has followed, will follow in the same course and method in this our America.

Mr. President, I therefore say that by the example set by Theodore Roosevelt in the matter of the coal strike of 1902, with its threat to the peace, the property, the harmony, and the justice of America; by that other example of Woodrow Wilson in the matter of the railroad strike of 1916 and that which pended over us; and of that, may it please you, sir, that is instinctive in the heart of the American to preserve his country from the fate which befalls these lands around us which in a moment of slackness and thoughtlessness have brought upon themselves, sir, the devastation they are now enduring—we should be warned, and some steps should be taken on the part of the authorities of this our country in a legitimate manner for investigation, deliberation, and some form of agency that shall find what is truth and justice and report it to America. Behind this result public opinion may express itself, and we may still preserve property in its rightful possession, the liberty and rights of the toiler in his full status before mankind, and peace and order throughout the Republic, to the end that this America may stand before the world recognized and remaining as the emblem of honor and the symbol of justice.

I thank the Senate for allowing me to intrude my expressed thought upon this order of appropriation debate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has called attention to numerous strikes and a new technique involved therein, which is known as the sit-down strike. As I understood him, he regards the situation as serious and fraught with serious implications.

It is most unfortunate that progress toward recovery in our industrial life is interrupted by serious labor controversies. During the past 2 years several million men who were unemployed have obtained employment and the volume of production in all fields of industry has been materially increased. The national income during the period referred to has increased by many billions of dollars. Statistical reports from governmental sources as well as from labor organizations indicate improvement in labor conditions, higher wages, and as I have indicated, increasing production and greater purchasing power in all parts of the Nation. It is true the national income has not attained the 1929 standard, but as I have stated, conditions in every part of our country are improving and give promise of an uninterrupted improvement, presaging the time in the not distant future when there will be greater general prosperity than that found in 1929. But, unfortunately the progress toward recovery is being arrested by the sit-down strikes and the attitude of various labor groups not associated with the American Federation of Labor.

A great labor leader of the past, Samuel Gompers, gave his life in improving labor conditions and in promoting concord among labor groups, and peace between employer and employee. The fine traditions of the American Federation of Labor, which were developed under Gompers' leadership have been carried forward under the inspiration and leadership of William Green, one of the outstanding leaders of labor in the United States. It is unfortunate that there should be discord, and indeed bitter strife, among the forces of labor, and that the fine structure erected under the guidance of the labor leaders to whom I have referred should be imperiled.

The Secretary of Labor has been widely quoted as declaring "the sit-down strike has not yet been proved to be illegal." Such an attitude is most unfortunate, and indeed cannot be justified. An examination of this new force which has been thrust into our labor and industrial life is of great public importance. It affects, as I have indicated, not only those who indulge in the sit-down strikes but hundreds of thousands, indeed, millions, in all walks of life. It affects not only those who use this weapon but a great army of men and women who are gainfully employed and who are forced into the ranks of the unemployed. Individuals beyond the local field in which sit-down strikes occur are affected, and many are thus compelled to join the ranks of the unemployed.

The questions involved in this movement are of great public importance, and this view is strengthened because of the belief by some that the chief contribution of a new labor movement has not rejected principles and policies which were condemned in a series of articles which were printed as a public document in the Sixty-eighth Congress, first session. The document was prepared by the United Mine Workers of America and published in the newspapers of the United States, and as stated, was ordered printed as Public Document No. 14.

The United Mine Workers organization held such strong convictions that it prepared a series of six articles and, as I have stated, circulated the same throughout the United States. Apparently the purpose of these articles was to show the inroads of communism on American labor organizations, and the systematic effort that was being made to infiltrate and undermine and seize it. The forces described in the articles referred to included in their program the following three points:

The promotion of a well-organized movement within the 4 railroad brotherhoods and 16 railroad trade-unions to amalgamate all railroad workers into "one departmentalized industrial union", controlled by a single leader of Communist principle and affiliation, and owing allegiance to the Communist organization.

Seizure of the American Federation of Labor, with the ouster of its officials, and through such seizure gaining control of all its affiliated units and trade-unions.

Conversion of all craft trade-unions into single units of workers within an industry known as "industrial unions", with coordination under a super-Soviet union owing allegiance to, and accepting the mandates of, the Communist International and its subsidiary, the Red Trade Union International, at Moscow.

Everyone is familiar with the usual meaning of a strike. It is the withdrawal from employment by a number of workmen for the purpose of depriving their employer of their labor in order to cause him to accede to the demands which have been presented and denied for the purpose of improving the hours of labor or wages or the working conditions of the strikers. Perhaps other factors are involved. Employees have believed that strikes were justified notwithstanding the inconveniences and in some instances the serious consequences resulting therefrom; but they have been associated with our industrial development and the courts have recognized the right of employees to strike to redress grievances and to secure what they believed to be their rights. But I think it may be said that it has been the practice among the members of well-led labor organizations, not to deprive themselves of employment, and then proceed to negotiate. Upon the contrary the employees have presented their grievances to their employers, and have carried on negotiations in order to reach an amicable adjustment. Strikes were the last resort among thoughtful labor leaders and members of labor organizations.

This morning I read a newspaper account of an address delivered by Mr. McGrady, Assistant Secretary of Labor, in which, referring to some of the sit-down strikes, he stated that some of the participants in such strikes were not members of labor organizations.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 4 appears an address delivered by Representative HOFFMAN, of Michigan, in which he stated that—

> A few days ago I called attention to the fact that hundreds of armed men had marched into Michigan from other States with the determination to close, and keep closed, these factories of Michigan, in which the vast majority of the workers have no quarrel with their employers. The morning papers disclose that thousands, instead of hundreds, of such armed men are now in Michigan for the accomplishment of this purpose. The situation, instead of improving, has gradually grown worse, in that each side, had it been so inclined, had opportunity to increase the number of its fighters and the improvement of their armament.

He further stated that—

> After the question of the right to occupy these plants had been decided adversely by the circuit court, the sit-down strikers, in telegrams to the Governor, announced their intention of holding possession, this in defiance of the law.

It would seem from the statement of Mr. McGrady, and the Representative just referred to, that in addition to employees who participated in sit-down strikes, there are persons not members of any labor union who aid the sit-down strikers. Perhaps some of them are agitators who are enemies of labor and are influenced by a desire to undermine our democratic institutions.

As I have stated, it has been the view of forward-looking and patriotic labor leaders to secure just and fair treatment for employees—not by violence, not by sit-down strikes, but by negotiation with employers.

The press, during the past few days, have referred to cases in which persons were ordered to strike, and no reasons were assigned; no complaint has been made by the employees referred to but they were given orders which to them were not justified.

It appears that sit-down strikes are planned in order that the concerted withdrawal from employment will be accompanied by a retention of the premises of the employer, in whole or in part, so that he will be deprived of his plant, or a department or section of it, the strikers remaining in possession, so that no one can take their places, but that every other operation of the department or plant in which they have been employed, or any process which is dependent upon their continued operation, will be brought to an abrupt stop. Thus we observe these elements in the strike:

(a) The employees quit work in concert.

(b) They remain at their machines, or in possession of the place where they are at work, while refusing to perform any function.

(c) Upon request, they refuse to evacuate the premises and resist any attempt to evict them.

(d) So far as the work of others is dependent on their operation, the others are deprived of the opportunity to continue their own operations.

(e) To remain in possession of the premises it is essential that the sit-down strikers should have the cooperation of persons outside the plant who maintain a line of communication to assure a flow of food and other supplies as the strikers may require.

The New Republic of January 26 last contains an article frankly pointing out the advantages of the new form of strike. It describes the superior gains from retaining the property of another as the base of an effort to enforce demands by refusing to return it to its owners unless concessions are made. The public prints, and testimony adduced in recent cases, show that sit-down strikers, as in Flint, Mich., are prepared to resist not only private effort but public authority in any effort to evict them, even under the orders of a court. In that instance, after hearing and argument, being fully represented by counsel, the strikers in possession of the plants of the General Motors Corporation were found armed with a great variety of bolts, bars, nuts, and other equipment with which deadly injury could have been inflicted upon officers seeking to enforce the court's order, and the strikers made plain, in public statements, their determination to employ such weapons against all comers. Recently the property of the Chrysler Co. was not only unlawfully seized and held against its officers and employees, but the former were denied access to their offices or records.

Mr. President, I was called from the Chamber a few moments ago by a gentleman who had just come from New York. He referred to the sit-down strikes in a number of hotels, as well as a number of business houses. He stated that no complaints had been made by the employees, and they were not advised of the reason why they were ordered to strike.

The newspapers refer to a number of cases in Michigan where similar conditions exist. One of the chief advantages, it is claimed, for this new weapon, is that a comparatively small number of men in any continuing-process industry can paralyze an operation and deprive of employment a great majority of their fellow workers who do not join in their effort.

We learned that sit-down strikers in Michigan picketed the court a day or two ago when the judge was hearing an application made by the owners of the plant to obtain relief to which they were entitled. The report stated that hundreds of men surrounded the courthouse and thronged the corridors and manifested not a friendly attitude towards the court. Such a proceeding cannot be condoned. If courts are to be intimidated or coerced then it can scarcely be said that there is a Government of law and order. It must be conceded that the sit-down strike is unlawful and may become criminal according to its development.

Under elementary practice of law it must be conceded that sit-down strikers are trespassers. Their right to enter upon the property of their employer terminated with the abandonment of their employment, and their refusal to leave the premises upon a request for evacuation makes them continuing trespassers. If they violently resist eviction they may be guilty of a variety of criminal acts, and if they hold the property of another for the purpose of compelling him to grant some demand or concession, as a condition of surrendering that which is his, they are plainly guilty of what is defined as extortion in the statutes of many States. They have, in effect, kidnaped a plant, and hold it for ransom.

I recall that the great Governor of Connecticut expressed his view a few days ago upon the question of sit-down strikes. The public press stated that in a conference with labor delegates he said to them with great determination, "There will be no sit-down strikes in Connecticut while I am Governor." The Herald Tribune, of New York, under date of March 4, carries an article dealing with the statement made by Governor Cross. I ask permission to have the article inserted at this place in my remarks without reading it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

GOVERNOR CROSS FINDS PUBLIC BACKING SIT-DOWN BAN—"HAVE ONLY DONE MY DUTY", HE SAYS IN ANSWER TO 100 LETTERS PRAISING STAND—GROTON FIRM BARS UNION—UNITED STATES CONCILIATOR SAYS BOAT COMPANY REFUSES TALKS

HARTFORD, CONN., March 4.—Gov. Wilbur L. Cross said tonight that he had received 100 letters approving his attitude toward sit-down strikes, as expressed last week, and the authorization granted to the State police to remove sit-down strikers from the plant of the Electric Boat Co. at Groton. When a committee of strikers saw him, Mr. Cross told them that "there will be no sit-down strikes in Connecticut while I am Governor."

The Governor said that so many letters approving his stand have come in that he found it necessary to reply to them all in a standardized letter, which follows:

"You have my most sincere thanks for commending my endeavor to keep Connecticut free from so-called sit-down strikes.

"As Governor, I have four times sworn to defend the constitution of the Commonwealth, which guarantees the protection of property as well as other rights of all persons within the State, and enjoins me to 'take care that the laws be faithfully executed.' Perhaps it is not generally understood that the word 'persons' has been construed by our courts, as well as by the Supreme Court of the United States, to include corporations. So you see that for me to take no action against sit-down strikers who invade the property of others would be to disregard my oath of office and would constitute a betrayal of the citizens of the State. You can see further that I have only done my duty.

"It seems strange to be living in an age when people regard a Governor who keeps his oath of office as an exception to the rule. You may recall the advice of Mark Twain, who said: 'Always do right. This will gratify some people and astonish the rest.'"

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me that strikes of this character are the acts of a combination. They are in many instances deliberately, sympathetically, and carefully planned, but as I have stated, in some cases the strikers are uninformed as to the reason for the strike or as to those who have ordered it.

Illustrations of the operations of the sit-down strikers will occur to Senators—clerks in the office of an individual or an employee in the home or upon the farm may adopt the sit-down policy, retain possession of the office or home or farm, perhaps giving no reason therefor or making no attempt to adjust any possible grievance. In cases of that character the police would be called, and the sit-down strikers ejected; but in the sit-down strikes now before us, it is not an individual acting, but many acting together, who not only withhold the property from its owners but make it impossible for hundreds of thousands of their fellow workers to continue profitable employment which they desire. The principles of law at issue are so familiar that I need not recite them to the Senate. They have been presented to courts many times over many years. Sit-down strikes offend the moral sense of the layman as quickly as they do the technical equipment of the lawyer.

I invite attention to the statement of one of the leaders of the standard labor movement in the United States, Mr. John Frey, head of the metal trades department of the American Federation of Labor. He states:

New policies and methods are being employed by international unions affiliated with the C. I. O. Sit-down strikes are advocated and put into effect.

While not a new form of labor action, the extensive use of sit-down strikes is an importation from France, where their application forced the most liberal government France has ever had, so far as labor is concerned, to take official action to suppress them.

Workmen taking physical possession of manufacturing plants is an importation from Italy. It was this method applied by Italian workmen which gave to Mussolini the opportunity of issuing those edicts which destroyed the voluntary trade-unions of that country and led to the compulsory organizing of the Fascist unions controlled by the Government.

The theory and practice of the so-called militant minority has the hallmark of Moscow and was imported from Russia.

The sit-down strike and the control of labor policy by a militant minority are deliberately intended to destroy self-government by trade-unions and set aside the principles of democratic self-government upon which the American trade-union movement has been built up.

Mr. President, a few days ago in the House of Representatives the Committee on Labor in reporting on a resolution submitted to it in reference to another matter spoke through its chairman, Mr. CONNERY of Massachusetts, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to make it very plain to the House that to the best of my knowledge—and I know that I am speaking personally, but I think I speak for every other member of the committee—not one of the members of the Committee on Labor endorses sit-down strikes. [Applause.] We do not believe that any man has a right to go on the property of another and then cease to work, and say, "I am going to sit down in this plant and not work", that plant being the property of another. [Applause.]

As Senators know, Mr. CONNERY is a genuine friend of labor and has been an important figure in securing legislation favorable to labor. It would seem that many most sympathetic with the cause of organized labor and its representative officials, condemn this unlawful and menacing weapon. It has been condemned, as I am advised, by every court in which it has been subjected to a legal test. I have not been advised as to whether those who instigate or utilize it offer a public defense of the same. If it continues without the reprobation of public officers and representatives and is further practiced in the form it has been appearing, there is great probability of its becoming the cause of serious public disorder, for it is now, it would seem, the established means by which the small minority of the employees in any industry or operation may effectively deprive their fellow employees of the opportunity for employment.

Further comment might be made with respect to the course of the Committee for Industrial Organization which finds in the sit-down strike its chief weapon. That committee, as I understand, abandons, if it does not condemn the craft and Federal organization methods of the American Federation of Labor, and seeks to destroy that long standing representative national organization of American labor. It is believed by some that it is endeavoring to substitute for it what is called the "industrial union" or what was commonly known in the West some years ago as the "one big union" idea, a scheme of organization rejected after trial. I may say that the United Mine Workers organization has been throughout its history especially jealous of its jurisdiction over all engaged in work in the mines, and it has been critical of "the industrial union" or the "one big union" idea.

My recollection is, but I may be mistaken, that the leaders of the United Mine Workers were in the past supporters of the policies of the American Federation of Labor as they were announced by Samuel Gompers and continued by Mr. Green.

Mr. President, the employees have the right to follow such leadership as they may desire, and to adopt those policies which they sincerely believe to be for their best good.

The labor movement in the United States has like all important developments had its difficulties, but its influence has extended and its objectives have found an increasing number of supporters. Personally I regret a schism which may interrupt labor's march in the direction of realizing its legitimate ideals. A labor movement which seeks the welfare of the workers and concord between employer and employee and the general welfare of all the people, is one to be commended. Discord and strife in the ranks of labor are not only harmful to the employee but also to the employer and to the public generally.

I referred a few moments ago to the articles published by the United Mine Workers which, as I interpreted them, condemned what was called the "industrial union" or the "one big union" plan, and reasons were given for such condemnation. The articles emphasized the point that revolutionary leaders in America were attempting to obtain control of the American Federation of Labor and reorganize the craft unions on the basis of one big union in an industry and to weld them into a central revolutionary agency. Marine transport workers were to be organized, railroad brotherhoods were to be seized if possible, and the United Mine Workers captured. The purpose of the movement, as indicated in the articles referred to, was to start strikes in a few localities and gradually have them spread to other labor unions and thus develop a Nation-wide outbreak in the great labor organizations.

Are the warnings contained in the articles published by the United Mine Workers, to which I have referred, against the plan and policies of those who sought the destruction of the American Federation of Labor and the establishment of an industrial union, or one big union, to be forgotten? It is a matter that demands most serious consideration by those who might plan to create an organization which finds its prototype in the organization condemned by the United Mine Workers in the six articles which but a few years ago it gave to the world.

TREASURY AND POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4720) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938, and for other purposes.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, when the Post Office Department appropriation bill was under consideration by the Committee on Appropriations a study was made of the postal deficit and its causes. The records show that for the last fiscal year postal revenues, including fees from money orders and profits from postal savings business amounted to $665,343,000. The audited expenditures amounted to $753,659,000, leaving a cash deficit of $88,316,000.

The Post Office Department, under an act approved on June 30, 1936, is authorized to claim credit for services rendered without charge to other branches of the Government. Deducting the amount of money which would have been received if there had been payment for the carrying of the mail carried free for other departments and agencies of the Government, which amounted to $74,002,000, the net or adjusted deficit of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, was $16,973,000.

Further study discloses that one of the causes of the deficit, if not the principal cause, is the carrying of printed matter through the mails for private publishers at a loss, or carrying mail for the Federal Government wholly without charge.

The loss with respect to private publications is shown in the hearings to be as follows:

On publications where there is a special rate for the advertising portion the loss was over $16,000,000; on daily newspapers the loss was more than $30,000,000; on newspapers, other than daily, the loss was over $12,000,000; on all other publications the loss exceeded $23,000,000; on the free-in-county distribution of newspapers and other publications the loss was above $8,000,000. The total loss for carrying private publications through the mail was over $91,000,000.

I have here a table showing the exact amount of the losses on private publications, which I shall have printed in the RECORD.

TABLE I.—Recapitulation of allocations and apportionments of postal revenues and expenditures for the fiscal year 1936 to the classes of mail and special services

Fiscal year 1936	Revenues	Expenditures	Excess of apportioned expenditures over revenues
Second class:
Publications exempt from zone rates on advertising under par. 4, sec. 538, Postal Laws and Regulations	$1,798,908.95	$18,585,935.14	$16,787,026.19
Zone rate publications:
Daily newspapers	8,149,951.42	38,236,073.59	30,086,122.17
Newspapers, other than daily	2,835,183.85	15,060,062.72	12,224,878.87
All other publications	7,805,305.41	31,577,997.01	23,712,691.60
Free-in-county, all publications		8,277,867.83	8,277,867.83
Total, publishers' second class	[1] 20,649,349.63	111,737,936.29	91,088,586.66

[1] Includes $60,825 revenue from second-class application fees.

As to Government publications, if the Post Office Department had been paid at the regular rates for what was carried free through the mails, the following revenues would have accrued:

On matter mailed under penalty by the departments and establishments of the Government the revenue would have been more than $32,000,000. On matter mailed under the franking privilege by Members of Congress the claim was for about $751,000. On other letters mailed under the franking privilege—the wives of former Presidents of the United States have that privilege—the total was only $246. On free matter for the blind the benefit extended amounted to a little over $109,000.

The actual total of all sums claimed by the Post Office Department for rendering such service free of charge was $33,713,305, as is shown by the following table:

Estimated amounts which would have been collected at regular rates of postage, including registry fees and surcharges, on matter mailed free during the fiscal years from 1930 to 1936, inclusive

	1930	1931	1932	1933	1934	1935	1936
Mailed under penalty privilege by departments and establishments of the Government exclusive of the Post Office Department	$9,347,505	$9,886,456	$9,151,899	$14,315,414	$23,094,882	$31,281,600	$32,236,269
Mailed under franking privilege by Members of Congress	718,060	723,671	778,436	1,019,621	775,785	577,162	751,579
Mailed under franking privilege by others	154,545	128,970	6,289	3,994	215	180	246
Publications mailed free in county	753,263	704,579	631,647	538,221	845,227	575,597	615,645
Free matter for the blind	63,779	132,161	133,641	90,522	103,552	131,700	109,566
Total	11,037,152	11,575,837	10,701,912	15,967,772	24,519,661	32,566,239	33,713,305

NOTE.—The decrease in the amount of matter mailed under the franking privilege by others than Members of Congress beginning in the fiscal year 1932 is due to the fact that matter previously mailed under the franking privilege by directors of agricultural experiment stations is being mailed under the penalty privilege.

Mr. President, I desire to direct the attention of the Senate to the fact that, so far as matter mailed by Members of Congress under the franking privilege is concerned, the loss of revenue to the Government has been fairly well stabilized over the past 7 years. In 1930 it amounted to $718,000. In 1931 it was $723,000. In 1932 the loss of revenue was $778,000. In the fiscal year 1933, which included the 6 months during which a Presidential political campaign was in progress, the loss was $1,019,000; in 1934 it dropped back to $775,000; in 1935 it was down to $577,000; and in 1936 the sum which would have been paid at regular postal rates was $751,000.

Compare that modest sum with the total cost of carrying penalty matter, that is, matter where the envelope states that there is a penalty of $300 for its use for private mail. For carrying the penalty matter for all the departments or agencies of the Government in 1932 the Post Office Department claimed a credit of $9,151,000; in 1933 the sum claimed was increased to $14,315,000; in 1934 it was $23,094,000; in 1935 it was $31,281,000; in 1936 it was $32,326,000. There has been an increase of over three and a half times in the expense to the Government of carrying free mail matter for the departments and establishments within a period of 5 years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to emphasize a fact which is most frequently referred to in the newspapers, that the cost of carrying mail for Representatives and Senators is so very great that it brings about the deficit. As the Senator from Arizona has just said, the entire cost of carrying free mail matter for Representatives and Senators amounts to something over $750,000 a year, and when we reflect that the appropriations for the Post Office Department amount in round numbers to $780,000,000 a year, it can be seen how inconsequential is this small amount for carrying the mail of Representatives and Senators.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, can the Senator tell us what the expenditure is for carrying free the matter of branches of the Government service other than the Congress?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Arizona has just pointed that out.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I stated a few minutes ago that in the last fiscal year whereas the cost of carrying all matter sent under congressional frank was only $751,000, for carrying the mails of all other branches of the Government the Post Office Department would have been paid, at the regular rates, $32,236,000.

I bring these facts to the attention of the Senate so that it may be understood that, so far as the postal deficit is concerned, the cost of what is sent free through the mails by Senators and Representatives amounts to less than 2½ percent of the volume of free mail sent by the departments and agencies of the Government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As I understand, the expense to the Government of the free mailing privilege of the departments has increased about $23,000,000 in 4 years. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. That cost has increased from $9,000,000 in 1932 to $32,000,000 in 1936.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There is $23,000,000 just for the postage item. If there is a $23,000,000 increase in the postage, I would hesitate to conjure what the final cost of this tremendous publicity machine of the departments must have been after their printing bills were paid and after all these expansive publicity staffs of $10,000 experts were paid. It must be a perfectly enormous burden. No wonder we cannot get within gunshot of a balanced Budget.

Mr. HAYDEN. Having in mind the great increase in the volume of departmental publications of all kinds, the Joint Committee on Printing, of which the Senator from Michigan and myself are members, at its last meeting directed that a letter be sent to every department and establishment of the Government in an effort to ascertain the facts, particularly with respect to a kind of publication that is so frequently issued, which is not set up in type but where typewritten sheets are photographed and, by what is known as the offset process, printing is done.

I desire to include in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks, a copy of the letter which is being sent to all of the governmental agencies calling upon them for complete information. The Senate may be assured that a very searching investigation is now under way on the part of the Joint Committee on Printing, with a view to determining what reductions can be made in the cost of departmental publications. As the Senator from Michigan has so well pointed out, there is not only the question of the postal losses in carrying such printed matter but there is the primary cost of the production of the article itself by the person paid to write it, then the printing of it, and the final cost of transportation and delivery through the mails.

I have today directed a letter to the Director of the Budget calling his attention to the facts developed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations with respect to departmental publications. I ask leave to have it printed in the RECORD along with the letter written by Representative LAMBETH, as chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING,
Washington, March 8, 1937.

SIR: The Joint Committee on Printing is of the opinion that a considerable amount of publicity matter and printing is now being produced, both in the District of Columbia and in the field, for the various branches of the Government service by the use of multigraphs, mimeographs, multiliths, and other methods of reproduction instead of being procured from the Government Printing Office as provided by law.

The committee desires a statement as to the extent to which such substitution for printing is now being done in Washington for each service of the Government.

A similar report is desired on all such work accomplished outside of the District of Columbia other than at duly authorized field plants.

The Joint Committee on Printing requests that a statement be furnished showing the information specified in the following numbered paragraphs, to which reference should be made in reporting. Where the quantity of the product is asked for, the report should cover the last 6 months.

ITEMS TO BE INCLUDED IN REPORT

1. Number, kind, location, and cost of all machinery or other equipment used in producing printed, typewritten, or similar matter, either by mimeographing, multigraphing, lithographing, or any other method of reproduction. Indicate in each instance if machinery is operated by motor or is equipped with self-feeders, automatic ink rollers, or other devices similar to regular printing presses, and whether metal type is used in connection with such printing, together with method of setting the same. If any such machinery or equipment has been bought since March 1, 1919, so state, and by what authority.

2. State, by classes, the kind of work done by such equipment, the approximate number of copies published of each, and the cost, including paper, if possible. Submit samples of each kind of work reported on or a sample of similar work, especially any journals, magazines, periodicals, and other similar publications.

3. State the number, kind, location, and cost of all addressing, folding, and mailing machinery and other equipment used for the distribution of matter reported on herein or any other matter printed for the use of the department or service, and by what authority purchased.

4. State the number of persons employed in the operation and supervision of the machines and equipment reported on under paragraphs nos. 1 and 3, together with their designation, location, compensation, and fund from which the same is paid.

The report covering the District of Columbia, or a preliminary statement, should be submitted not later than April 1, and that for the field service not later than May 1.

Additional copies of this letter will be furnished upon request.

Very truly yours,

WALTER LAMBETH, Chairman.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1937.

Mr. DANIEL W. BELL,
Director, Bureau of the Budget, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BELL: Enclosed is a copy of the Senate hearings on the Post Office Department appropriation bill, on pages 150 to 162 of which will be found a discussion of the postal deficit for the past fiscal year, which was, gross, $88,316,324, or net, after credits allowed by law, $16,973,167.

The record shows that the Post Office Department suffered a net loss of over $90,000,000 in the transportation and delivery of private publications, such as magazines and daily and weekly newspapers, but that is a form of subsidy for which the Congress is responsible and which you cannot correct. Government publications, however, do come under the control of the Bureau of the Budget, and I direct your particular attention to the tabulation on page 162, which shows a startling increase in the amount of matter mailed free of charge by the several Federal departments and establishments.

Under the act of June 9, 1930, the Post Office Department claimed credit for penalty mail in 1932 in the sum of $9,151,899, but the tabulation shows that the credit claimed in 1936 had increased over three and one-half times, to $32,236,269. In an effort to ascertain a probable cause for this increase I asked the Government Printing Office to give me the value of work delivered to the departments and other Federal agencies for the same 5 years, and have been furnished with the following figures:

1932	$14,333,380.35
1933	12,941,095.24
1934	12,949,752.01
1935	16,465,026.97
1936	18,756,268.94

This data clearly indicates that the product of the Government Printing Office, which increased less than one-half, is not responsible for the great advance in the amount of penalty mail that the departments and establishments have required the Postal System to carry free of charge. The bulk of that increase, aside from letter mail, must be derived from one source, and that is the large number of publications which are being produced by offset printing, which the linotype operators designate as "bootleg", because no typesetting is required.

During the period when every effort was being made to relieve the economic depression there was undoubtedly a substantial need for direct governmental publicity, but with the improvement in employment and business conditions it would seem that the time has arrived to apply the brakes. My suggestion is that you direct that an investigation be made to determine:

First, what publications produced by the offset method, which are in the nature of "house organs", may be stopped.

Second, what can be done to reduce the frequency of such publications by making dailies into weeklies, weeklies into monthlies, and monthlies into quarterlies.

Third, what would be the effect of requiring many of such publications to adopt a reduction in size.

It must cost much more to produce such publications than to send them through the mails so that the actual saving to the Government by cutting their size, reducing their frequency, or doing away with some of them will be more than is disclosed by the postal figures.

Like all other Senators I recently received a timely and well-written bound volume of 288 pages entitled "Landlord and Tenant on the Cotton Plantation", which was produced by offset printing. I shall be obliged if you will advise me whether your Bureau authorized its publication. If proper records were kept, I would also like to know the actual cost of producing that book as compared to what it would have cost if printed in the usual way at the Government Printing Office.

Yours very sincerely,

CARL HAYDEN,
United States Senate.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill now under consideration, and I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will consent to take the amendment to conference. On page 21, line 7, under appropriations for the Federal Alcohol Administration the amount of money appropriated is $425,000. This is a reduction from last year's appropriation of $50,000.

I should like to point out that despite the rapid growth of the alcohol industry, this particular Bureau has been forced to curtail its force considerably during the last year. It now has a total of 181 employees, and, while 15,000 permits have been issued, the Bureau has only 20 field investigators.

I move that the $425,000 be stricken out and that the appropriation be increased to $475,000, which was the amount of last year's appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, as I understand, the chief of the Federal Alcohol Administration desired to appear before the Senate Committee on Appropriations, but, through some mistake, he was not invited.

Mr. MALONEY. The Senator is correct. He did appear at the hearing and waited some time, but did not have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under those circumstances I shall be glad to let the amendment go to conference. I cannot say what will be done with it, but we will see what can be done. I am willing that the matter go to conference.

Mr. MALONEY. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there are no further amendments to be offered, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill H. R. 4720 was read the third time and passed.

ACCEPTANCE OF REAL ESTATE DONATED BY HENRY FORD AND WIFE

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 272, to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, on behalf of the Government of the United States, to accept a gift of 38 acres of land in Detroit from Mr. and Mrs. Henry Ford for the purpose of erecting a veterans' hospital thereon.

Because of the fact that there is a condition in the gift, it is necessary that approval be made by Congress. The House has passed the measure. The Senate Finance Committee has unanimously reported it favorably. I have spoken to both the majority and the minority leaders, and they have no objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution. There is absolutely no objection on the part of anyone to it. It has met with the approval of the various Government departments concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 272) to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to accept title for the United States to certain real property to be donated by Mr. Henry Ford and wife for Veterans' Administration facility purposes was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept on behalf of the United States title to a triangular tract of land bounded by Southfield Road, Snow or Pepper Road, and Outer Drive, in Ecorse Township, Wayne County, State of Michigan, containing approximately 38 acres, to be donated by Mr. Henry Ford and Clara J. Ford, his wife, upon the condition that such property be used for the purpose of constructing, operating, and maintaining what is now designated as a Veterans' Administration Facility or which may hereafter be so designated or similarly designated by or in accordance with law, which may include domiciliary, hospital, regional office, and such other activities essential to the functioning of the facility, and when no longer used for this purpose the property donated to revert to the grantors, their heirs, executors, or assigns, the said tract of land being described as follows:

Lands lying in private claim 31, Ecorse Township, Wayne County, Mich., and described more particularly as follows:

Commencing at the point of intersection of the easterly line of Southfield (formerly known as Town Line) Road, of 204-foot width and the northerly line of Outer Drive of 150-foot width; thence easterly along the northerly line of said Outer Drive 193.48 feet along the arc of a curve of radius 274.20 feet to a point which is south 78°19'30" E. 189.45 feet from the last previously mentioned point; thence north 81°27'50" E. 1,790 feet along the said northerly line of Outer Drive; thence easterly 156.89 feet measured along the arc of a curve of 575.54 feet radius to a point on the center line of Snow (formerly Pepper) Road, which bears north 89°16'20" E. 156.14 feet from the last previously mentioned point; thence northwesterly along the center line of said Snow Road, north 37°04'00" W. 1,566.96 feet and north 27°03'10" W. 253.60 feet to the point of intersection with the said easterly line of Southfield Road; thence southerly along the said easterly line of Southfield Road south 31°44'00" W. 2,003.69 feet to the point of commencement, containing 38.930 acres, more or less.

AUTHORITY TO REPORT BILLS DURING RECESS OR ADJOURNMENT

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is very little business ready for consideration by the Senate. We have been able to keep the work well down to date. I ask unanimous consent that during the recess or adjournment following today's session the Committee on Appropriations may have leave to submit reports. I will state that in view of the condition of business in the Senate it is my purpose to move an adjournment or recess until Friday if the consent requested shall be granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 217, providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art. I desire to call it up from the desk and offer several amendments to it.

Mr. McNARY. Does it come up in the nature of a conference report?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; it does not.

Mr. McNARY. Or the substitution of the Senate measure for the House measure?

Mr. CONNALLY. In effect, the substitution of the Senate measure for the House measure. However, I will say to the Senator that in order to simplify the matter, instead of offering the entire Senate joint resolution as a substitute, I shall simply offer to the House joint resolution the two or three little amendments which were agreed to by the Senate on Monday last, so that when the joint resolution goes back to the House it will be in the same form as the joint resolution passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 217) providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer four amendments, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The amendments were, in section 4, page 3, line 21, after the word "public", to insert "free of charge"; in section 5, page 5, line 13, after the word "no", to strike out "works" and insert "work"; in the same line, after the word "be", to strike out "exhibited in" and insert "included in the permanent collection of"; and in line 19, after the word "unless", to strike out "they are" and insert "it be", so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the area bounded by Seventh Street, Constitution Avenue, Fourth Street, and North Mall Drive NW., in the District of Columbia, is hereby appropriated to the Smithsonian Institution as a site for a National Gallery of Art. The Smithsonian Institution is authorized to permit the A. W. Mellon Educational and Charitable Trust (hereinafter referred to as the donor) to construct on said site for the Smithsonian Institution a building to be designated the National Gallery of Art, and to remove any existing structure and landscape the grounds within said area. The adjoining area bounded by Fourth Street, Pennsylvania Avenue, Third Street, and North Mall Drive NW., in the District of Columbia, is hereby reserved as a site for future additions to the National Gallery of Art. The project shall be in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the Commission of Fine Arts.

SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby established in the Smithsonian Institution a bureau, which shall be directed by a board to be known as the Trustees of the National Gallery of Art, whose duty it shall be to maintain and administer the National Gallery of Art and site thereof and to execute such other functions as are vested in the board by this act. The board shall be composed as follows: The Chief Justice of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, ex officio; and five general trustees who shall be citizens of the United States, to be chosen as hereinafter provided. No officer or employee of the Federal Government shall be eligible to be chosen as a general trustee.

(b) The general trustees first taking office shall be chosen by the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, subject to the approval of the donor, and shall have terms expiring one each on July 1 of 1939, 1941, 1943, 1945, and 1947, as designated by the Board of Regents. A successor shall be chosen by a majority vote of the general trustees and shall have a term expiring 10 years from the date of the expiration of the term for which his predecessor was chosen, except that a successor chosen to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of such term shall be chosen only for the remainder of such term.

SEC. 3. Upon completion of the National Gallery of Art, the board shall accept for the Smithsonian Institution as a gift from the donor a collection of works of art which shall be housed and exhibited in the National Gallery of Art.

SEC. 4. (a) The faith of the United States is pledged that, on completion of the National Gallery of Art by the donor in accordance with the terms of this act and the acquisition from the donor of the collection of works of art, the United States will provide such funds as may be necessary for the upkeep of the National Gallery of Art and the administrative expenses and costs of operation thereof, including the protection and care of works of art acquired by the board, so that the National Gallery of Art shall be at all times properly maintained and the works of art contained therein shall be exhibited regularly to the general public free of charge. For these purposes there are hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary.

(b) The board is authorized to accept for the Smithsonian Institution and to hold and administer gifts, bequests, or devises of money, securities, or other property of whatsoever character for the benefit of the National Gallery of Art. Unless otherwise restricted by the terms of the gift, bequest, or devise, the board is authorized to sell or exchange and to invest or reinvest in such investments as it may determine from time to time the moneys, securities, or other property composing trust funds given, bequeathed, or devised to or for the benefit of the National Gallery of Art. The income as and when collected shall be placed in such depositaries as the board shall determine and shall be subject to expenditure by the board.

(c) The board shall appoint and fix the compensation and duties of a director, an assistant director, a secretary, and a chief curator of the National Gallery of Art, and of such other officers and employees of the National Gallery of Art as may be necessary for the efficient administration of the functions of the board. Such director, assistant director, secretary, and chief curator shall be compensated from trust funds available to the board for the purpose, and their appointment and salaries shall not be subject to the civil-service laws or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended. The director, assistant director, secretary, and chief curator shall be well qualified by experience and training to perform the duties of their office and the original appointment to each such office shall be subject to the approval of the donor.

(d) The actions of the board, including any payment made or directed to be made by it from any trust funds, shall not be subject to review by any officer or agency other than a court of law.

SEC. 5. (a) The board is authorized to adopt an official seal which shall be judically noticed and to make such bylaws, rules, and regulations, as it deems necessary for the administration of its functions under this act, including, among other matters, bylaws, rules, and regulations relating to the acquisition, exhibition, and loan of works of art, the administration of its trust funds, and the organization and procedure of the board. The board may function notwithstanding vacancies, and three members of the board shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business.

(b) In order that the collection of the National Gallery of Art shall always be maintained at a high standard and in order to prevent the introduction therein of inferior works of art, no work of art shall be included in the permanent collection of the National Gallery of Art unless it be of similar high standard of quality to those in the collection acquired from the donor.

(c) The board shall have all the usual powers and obligations of a trustee in respect of all trust funds administered by it and all works of art acquired by it.

(d) The board shall submit to the Smithsonian Institution an annual report of its operations under this act, including a detailed statement of all acquisitions and loans of works of art and of all public and private moneys received and disbursed.

SEC. 6. (a) The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to close Sixth Street NW. within the boundaries of the site for the National Gallery of Art. The National Capital Park and Planning Commission shall determine the building lines and approve the plan of approaches for said gallery, and shall also make recommendations for the widening and adjustment of Third, Seventh, Ninth, and such other streets in the vicinity as may be necessary and desirable to provide for the traffic which would otherwise use Sixth Street.

(b) Section 10 of the Public Building Act, approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat. L., p. 881), relating to the George Washington Memorial Building, and all provisions of law amendatory thereof, are hereby repealed.

(c) The existing bureau of the Smithsonian Institution now designated as a national gallery of art shall hereafter be known as the National Collection of Fine Arts.

(d) The fifth paragraph under the heading "Smithsonian Institution" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1924, approved February 13, 1923 (42 Stat. L. 1235), relating to the erection of a national gallery of art, is hereby repealed.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

CONTROL OF INSECT PESTS AND PLANT DISEASES

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) making funds available for the control of incipient or emergency outbreaks of insect pests or plant diseases, including grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, and chinch bugs.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, on behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I move that the Senate disagree to the House amendments, request a conference thereon with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SMITH, Mr. WHEELER, Mr. GILLETTE, and Mr. CAPPER conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Capt. Frank H. Sadler to be a rear admiral in the Navy from the 1st day of March 1937; and also the nominations of sundry officers and citizens for appointment as officers in the Navy.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of William H. Hastie, of Washington, D. C., to be judge for the District Court of the Virgin Islands, vice Judge George P. Jones, appointed in recess.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably the following nominations:

Walter F. Boyle, of Georgia, now a Foreign Service officer of class 4 and a consul, to be a consul general of the United States; and Francis H. Styles, of Virginia, now a Foreign Service officer of class 6 and a consul, to be also a secretary in the Diplomatic Service of the United States.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported favorably Executive F, Seventy-fifth Congress, first session, being a convention between the United States and Canada signed at Ottawa on January 29, 1937, which revises the Convention for the Preservation of the Halibut Fishery of the Northern Pacific Ocean and Bering Sea, signed between the two Governments at Ottawa on May 9, 1930, and submitted a report (Exec. Rept. No. 1) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

THE JUDICIARY

The legislative clerk read the nomination of J. Earl Major, of Illinois, to be United States circuit judge for the seventh circuit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Dr. Edgar E. Findlay to be assistant surgeon from date of oath.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, nominations of postmasters now on the calendar are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon on Friday next.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 17, 1937

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the Father of us all, we thank Thee for that providence which watches over human affairs. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without the Father's notice. Fill us with the spirit of praise and gratitude, and may we reach forth toward a better manhood with ardor and with patient perseverance. Blessed Lord God, we bless Thee for the pure, self-sacrificing sons of God of the mighty past who were bearers of that gospel that brings out of the darkness the morning light and the glory of the Lord. We pause today in memory of one of earth's great immortals. His name is unsullied, unblemished, and untainted. He was inspired by the urgency of a great duty and stimulated in the joy of a great purpose. Sorrowing yet rejoicing, poor yet making many rich, having nothing yet possessing all things, he lived and died for the love of Christ and for the salvation of man. O God, bring together in the simplicity of truth and love all those of every name, so that the whole brotherhood of man may walk together. In the name of our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday, Tuesday, March 16, 1937, was read and approved.

THE SHILLELAGH AND DECORUM IN THE HOUSE

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Speaker, today, on this 17th of March, most of the civilized world pays its respect to the birthday of a distinguished leader, liberator, and prelate—St. Patrick. Would that he were alive today; there is so much similar work to be done. There still are "snakes."

But, Mr. Speaker, I did not rise to eulogize the great saint of Ireland. That will be ably attended to this evening throughout the world by countless orators.

Rather do I rise at this time to comment upon the determined and partially successful effort our beloved Speaker has made during this session of the Seventy-fifth Congress to preserve order in this Chamber of the House of Representatives of the United States. It is a worth-while ambition upon his part and is commended by us all. But the tools afforded him, in the nature of gavels, are not equal to the task. He has wielded formidable looking weapons, some of them resembling bungstarters. He has pounded with tiring instruments resembling a dentist's mallet.

Today I have here with me that well-known instrument of persuasion, famed in song and story—the shillelagh. [Laughter and applause.]

It was brought back from the "old sod" last year and presented to me by a good friend, Mr. John Ward, of the Government Printing Office.

It is but the natural root of the blackthorn tree, so profuse on the Emerald Isle. The branches of that beautiful tree are used for those attractive and thorny walking sticks often besported on our streets, especially by our farmer Members.

The walking cane is, however, light and easy to swing in that nonchalant fashion of the congressional dandy, but the root forming the shillelagh, which I hold in my hand, is much more substantial. It carries weight—and how. It is naturally formed in the shape of a gavel. It is, in fact, Nature's emblem of authority.

Mr. Speaker, the shillelagh is the world's greatest persuader. Nature ordained it for that very purpose. History records its effective use in the art of persuasion—an art much more advanced in days gone by than in this hour, I regret to say.

Whether the shillelagh is used on the gavel block or in the nature of "scalp treatment", its persuasive powers have no equal. It has been known to rest but for the mere fraction of a second on the dome of the skull with an effect that was remarkably persuasive. As Raleigh said, "Whom none could advise, thou has persuaded."

So, Mr. Speaker, in support of your worth-while effort to maintain order in this august body, I now loan to you this famed handiwork of Nature—persuader of persuaders—the Irish shillelagh. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. [Laughter.]

Members of the House, from time immemorial the Speaker of the House has had as an emblem and symbol of his authority as such, two instrumentalities: First, the conventional gavel, to which the gentleman from New York has referred; and, secondly, the mace, which stands on the right of the Speaker, and which is the real symbol of the ultimate authority of the Speaker to establish peace and decorum in this Chamber. I have frequent occasion to use the minor weapon. The major weapon is infrequently used, only in cases of great riot and rebellion in the House.

Now, I am presented with a third instrument for order and decorum—the root of the blackthorn from Erin. I have heard a good deal about the practical uses of this weapon among the old-fashioned Celts in the old country [laughter], but I never thought I would have the privilege of exercising it from the Speaker's stand as an emblem of parliamentary power.

I do not know whether this is a very appropriate time for this emblem of onslaught and attack to be presented to the Speaker, for the reason we are now in the very midst of considering and passing upon a neutrality bill [applause], and I have heard it said that it is one of the characteristics of the Irish race that whenever there is a two-fisted fight of any sort started anywhere in the world no Irishman can remain neutral. [Laughter and applause.] I imagine this is the origin of this device. I hope it will not be necessary for me to use it today in the form in which it is usually presented, but if the House should become so inordinately riotous or tumultuous that the laying on of this blackthorn upon a few recalcitrant skulls might be essential to preserve order, I shall call upon the Sergeant at Arms to do so.

I am very happy to have the loan of this historic gavel from my friend, and I think it well enough sometimes, in the seriousness of our considerations here, to have a little harmless diversion like we have had this morning. [Applause.]

Will the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] kindly take the chair for a moment?

Mr. RAYBURN assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my very painful duty to announce to the House the departure from the scene of life's activities of a very distinguished and outstanding son of Alabama and of the United States, Capt. Richmond Pearson Hobson, latterly known through the signal honor conferred upon him by the Congress of the United States as Rear Admiral Richmond P. Hobson. I think it may be singularly appropriate that I should undertake to express a few sentiments of respect and admiration for this distinguished son of my State because of the fact that for a number of years he represented in this Chamber a large part of the congressional district which I now have the honor to serve in this House. I think it needless for me to undertake to recall to your consideration the distinguished naval, political, and civic career of Admiral Hobson. It comes to few men out of the millions who live and serve in this country to attain a position of unique and outstanding reputation for brilliancy of intellect or for courage or for some unusual eminence that the man of whom I am now speaking certainly had reached in the consideration and affection and respect of the American people. Every school boy and girl in this country, as well as adults, now are familiar with his historic naval exploit, while in the service of the United States Navy, in the harbor of Santiago during the Spanish-American War, where, at the very risk of his life and that of his associates, he undertook that bold and heroic adventure under the command of the admiral of the American fleet. All are familiar with his subsequent imprisonment and release therefrom, his distinguished and successful career in politics thereafter, and I imagine that what gave him more real satisfaction than any other service which he rendered to the country, his devotion to the principles of social and spiritual uplift of the people of America and of the world.

Captain Hobson opposed my honored father for a seat in the House of Representatives and defeated him. A number of years after that when I aspired to come to the House, he opposed me, and I defeated him. During the course of those contests there was a considerable amount of political and possibly personal bitterness injected, but I am now happy to recall that with the passage of time, which is a generous solvent for so many of our imagined indignities and pains and prejudices, in the latter part of his life there had been established between us a most cordial sentiment of friendship and mutual respect, and it made me very happy to stand in this place on the floor of the House and be instrumental in securing the passage of the bill that conferred upon him the honor of rear admiral in the Navy of the United States. This man has conferred not only luster upon himself and his State but upon the whole country, and I deeply regret his departure. When in his home in New York City yesterday "the pallid messenger with the inverted torch" beckoned Admiral Hobson to depart, he carried away an outstanding and distinguished son of our Commonwealth.

I am advised that his funeral services will be held tomorrow afternoon at 2 o'clock among the mounded silences of great old Arlington Cemetery, and if it may be convenient to any Member of the House to attend those services as a mark of respect and honor to a great American, I am sure that it will be gratifying to his family, as it would be to the members of the Alabama delegation. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] in the splendid tribute which he has paid to Admiral Hobson, one of America's most distinguished sons.

The first time that I ran for Congress, Admiral Hobson, Captain Hobson at that time, was a candidate for Congress against our present distinguished Speaker. Our districts joined for about 100 miles. I became very well acquainted with those two gentlemen and was very much struck with the high plane upon which they pitched their campaign. As time went on, my experience through association with those two distinguished leaders fully justified the high opinion I formed of them both in that campaign.

I never met a more lovable character than Richmond P. Hobson, or one who bore his honors with finer grace.

No man connected with the Spanish-American War will live longer in history than will this brave and generous son of Alabama, who performed the outstanding feat of heroism in that unfortunate conflict.

The last time I saw Admiral Hobson he spoke of the way people distort history, and gave some illustrations.

He said he was once introduced to an English army officer by a friend who referred to him as "the hero of the Merrimac." The Englishman evidently thought the Merrimac was a land engagement, for he said, "Ah, General Hobson, I have read the history of that battle with great care, and I have always admired the tactics you employed."

On another occasion he said he was introduced as the "hero of the Titanic." But he said one fellow, on another occasion, reached the limit when he presented him as "the man who sank the Lusitania."

All of this goes to show how little some of us know, even of the current history through which we pass, and how soon great achievements are forgotten or the memories of them distorted in the public mind.

But, as has been well said, "It is after death that we measure men."

Probably his passing away will revive interest in his career and cause the children of this and future generations to study more closely the life and character of this great man; and I have no doubt but that with the passing years he will continue to grow in the estimation of all enlightened people throughout the world.

He was an illustrious hero, a distinguished statesman, and a worthy citizen, of whom it can be truthfully said that—

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday, after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk, and at the conclusion of the special orders already made, I be granted 15 minutes in which to address the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

EDWARD N. JERRY

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation be discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 44) for the relief of Edward N. Jerry, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House at this time for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to your attention a matter which to me is of very profound importance, inasmuch as I have made so many addresses on the subject.

On last Friday the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Morgenthau, practically announced the death of many of your favorite measures before Congress. He said, in effect, that he was not nonsocial, but that we must now balance the Budget, and that we must not borrow any more money.

Now we have a statement by Governor Eccles, of the Federal Reserve Board, saying that he has been misrepresented. I fear he thinks that some of us may have misrepresented him, inasmuch as I have quoted him as saying before our committee—and it is in the RECORD several times—that he did not fear a debt of $40,000,000,000—and that we must assume that he was the banker who told the President he did not fear a debt of $50,000,000,000. Now he has warned us, and, in conjunction with the warning of the Secretary of the Treasury, we certainly must take heed. He cannot free himself of the dangers created by his monetary policies by saying that if inflation does come it is because of labor demands and because of high prices now being asked as the result of those demands. If the President's own advisers are warning us of calamity in the near future, shall we not take immediate cognizance of it and forego demands for further measures that will cost more billions of dollars?

If these demands become too insistent, we should work for an early adjournment of this Congress. I am pleased that these officials are now awake to the dangers of their own former policies. What I have so often said heretofore regarding huge spendings on borrowed money seems to have contained the element of truth. These former statements by Governor Eccles were made before our Banking Committee, and they were, indeed, very worrisome to some of us.

I ask, in all earnestness, that the comments made during the next week on this subject shall receive your very careful consideration.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. THOM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to another 5 minutes, but the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has some bills that it is important to dispose of. This is the first day we have had in 16 years. I would like to have an opportunity to dispose of some of the business.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say to the gentleman that I asked yesterday for 5 minutes and it was refused me. I have been very patient this morning. I would like to have 5 minutes after the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOM] has concluded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOM]?

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and insert in connection with my own remarks a letter from Jeff Busby, a former Member of this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday. The Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees.

DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS WHO FRAUDULENTLY MARRY CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DICKSTEIN (when the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I call up H. R. 28, to authorize the deportation of aliens who secured preference-quota or nonquota visas through fraud by contracting marriage solely to fraudulently expedite admission to the United States, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (f) of section 9 of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended (43 Stat. 158; U. S. C., title 8, sec. 209, subdivision (f)), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. (f) Nothing in this section shall be construed to entitle an immigrant, in respect of whom a petition under this section is granted, either to enter the United States as a nonquota immigrant if, upon arrival in the United States, he is found not to be a nonquota immigrant, or to enter the United States as a preference-quota immigrant if, upon arrival in the United States, he is found not to be a preference-quota immigrant."

SEC. 2. That subdivision (a) of section 13 of the Immigration Act of 1924, as amended (43 Stat. 161; U. S. C., title 8, sec. 213 (a)), is amended to read as follows:

"No immigrant shall be admitted to the United States unless he (1) has an unexpired immigration visa or was born subsequent to the issuance of the immigration visa of the accompanying parent; (2) is of the nationality specified in the visa in the immigration visa; (3) is a nonquota immigrant if specified in the visa in the immigration visa as such; (4) is a preference-quota immigrant if specified in the visa in the immigration visa as such; and (5) is otherwise admissible under the immigration laws."

SEC. 3. That any alien who at any time after entering the United States is found to have secured either non-quota or preference-quota visa through fraud, by contracting a marriage which, subsequent to entry into the United States, has been judicially annulled retroactively to date of marriage, shall be taken into custody and deported pursuant to the provisions of section 14 of the Immigration Act of 1924 on the ground that at time of entry he was not entitled to admission on the visa presented upon arrival in the United States. This section shall be effective whether entry was made before or after the enactment of this act.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes from the committee unanimously. It has the endorsement of the Department.

This bill will simply add another section providing for deportation of any alien who contracts a marriage by fraud for the purpose of coming to the United States under the quota. It is what is commonly known as the "gigolo" bill. We found a number of so-called aliens who could not possibly enter this country because of quota conditions, who have contracted a marriage which, in itself, was fraudulent, for the purpose of evading the immigration law. This bill has the highest recommendation from this committee for favorable action.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I wish the gentleman would explain how the bill would work, for his statement is rather general. Will he give us an illustration of how a person can get here through fraudulent marriage?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Let us take a country the quota of which is very small. A man in that country wishes to come into this country. He needs a preference status. If he marries an American citizen, an American woman, the woman honestly believing that he is sincere in this marriage, honestly believing that he is going to live with her as her husband, he is entitled to a preference. Because of the small quotas in these countries, people of those countries have in many instances entered into fraudulent marriage contracts with American citizens simply as a subterfuge to get into this country. When he gets into this country we immediately discover that he had absolutely no intention to live with this woman and did not intend to assume the contractual relationship of husband and wife.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am a little rusty on these changes in the law. As I understand it, an American male citizen may marry a foreign woman and bring her in as his wife, provided she is in good mental and physical health and complies with the regulations for good character, and so forth.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. She has to be in perfect health.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. But a woman cannot marry a man and bring him in, as I understand it, except that we did pass a law affecting such cases up to about the year 1928, and I think it has been moved up once since then to 1929. What is the limitation now beyond which the marriage does not admit a husband?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Under the acts of 1924 and 1929, where a woman marries an alien, petitions the Department of Labor, proves that she is a citizen, and that she has married an alien, he is entitled to a preference under section 6 of the Immigration Act of 1924 and the amendments thereto. That preference more or less is a first preference.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does that apply to marriages even up to this date? What is the limitation?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The exemption ended in 1931.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Let us follow that up a little further. If a woman has married a foreigner since 1931, she cannot bring him in just because he is her husband.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. She cannot bring him in, but she can get him a first preference.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. She can make a request to the Department of Labor asking that her husband be put in the class that will be given first preference; but, because he gets in the first-preference class, that does not give her or anybody else the right to bring him in ahead of this class.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In the first-preference class are put mothers, fathers, wives, and husbands of American citizens.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Let us just follow that up further. If that be the case, suppose an American woman marries a man in Czechoslovakia. If she makes application there that he be put in the first preference class he must be examined by our consular and immigration officers.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Absolutely. It goes further than that. He must first be examined by the medical officers of the Health Service and show that he is physically fit. He must be examined by the consul, and he must comply with all the laws pertaining to admission.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Then if he passes all these examinations and comes here and it develops that he has not entered into the marital relationship as he should and it develops that he never intended to carry out the marriage contract, then he is put on the deportable list.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word in order to follow up the colloquy between the gentleman from New York and myself, which is proving so interesting to me.

Suppose this man is put in the first-preference class, he must come here before we can discover really that he has not or does not intend to carry out his martial agreement. When he gets here what is the next process?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If he gets into this country, first he must comply with all the requirements just like every other alien—he gets no benefits so far as the law is concerned; but then if he comes in here and the American wife has evidence to show that this man has perpetrated a fraud upon her for the purpose of making her sign a petition to give him that preference, and he does not enter into and will not consummate any marriage that he contracted on the other side, all she would have to do under the pending bill would be to present this evidence to a court, and if the court decrees that the marriage was procured, obtained, or entered into by fraud, then the Department of Labor will have the right to deport him.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I know that can be done, of course; but suppose this arrangement is made between these two people with criminal intent in the minds of both; in other words, this man simply buys his way into this country by inducing this woman to enter into this contract, what right have the people of this country, what right have the immigration officials when this man has come to this country and not carried out his arrangement, has not lived with this woman, is not her lawful husband, and takes no responsibility of a husband? What is our right under this bill?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. There are other provisions of the 1917 law and the 1924 law to take care of people who actually commit a fraud upon the Government by signing a petition, because they are guilty of fraud in that instance.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is what I am coming to.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. There ought to be some provision in that regard. It looks to me like the gentleman is simply playing into the hands of these people because the most trouble we have from what is trying to be cured here comes from men on the other side who buy their way into this country. They induce some woman to go through with this bogus marriage arrangement and never intend to carry it out. She is paid for it, and a woman could bring a man into this country this month, another man next month, and so on, and could enter into the business of bringing men in. Under this bill she alone must raise the question. If she does not raise the question, we cannot do anything about it.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman is developing some other thought and consideration which deals with fraud. That has no bearing on this bill and is not within the scope of the intended legislation. From the examination which the Department has made and which the committee made, we do not find the condition to exist that the gentleman relates. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio, assuming a man and an American woman, or an American man or an American woman, entered into such a conspiracy, if it is for the purpose of evading the law they are guilty of perjury, and can be convicted and their citizenship canceled under the 1917 act and the 1929 act.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Would the gentleman object to an amendment when we come to the proper place in the bill? Let us pass an amendment to the effect if and when she does file that petition and the petition is granted, then and at that time the man shall be immediately deportable.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Well, this provides for immediate deportation.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Where does it provide for that?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The point is you cannot deport a man who has perpetrated a fraud on the other side with an American woman until that man gets into this country and the woman institutes proceedings and establishes fraud in a court of record.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. We have developed the situation to this point: I can see where the wife could take advantage of this situation. This would be a wonderful opportunity to do what the gentleman is trying to prevent. When she finds that this fellow will not carry out his agreement and that he has come into the country for this purpose, when the court has found such a condition to exist and grants a divorce, that fellow ought to be deportable. If she does not want him, and she brought him here, we do not want him either. Let us get rid of him.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I want to develop the thought a little further. I think we can supply an amendment which will not hurt this bill but, on the contrary, will strengthen it a lot. We will find the place in this bill and insert just one simple amendment. I am not trying to delay the bill, I do not want to be put in the position of being against the bill, and I do not want to oppose it, but I think while we are at it we ought to put some teeth in these things. The women in these cases may not be to blame. Every time we have amended the law in this respect we have provided that a man may bring his wife in, but that the woman could not bring the husband in. Why? Because, in fact, we have said that the woman is the weaker of the two and is more susceptible to blandishments at the hands of man. It is thought that it would be pretty hard for a woman to induce a man to marry her for the purpose of assisting her to enter unlawfully, but it is easy for a man with a little money to come to this country on a visit, or acting through an emissary in this country to say to a woman: "You go through this performance with me. It will all be perfunctory. Here is your thousand dollars and when I get there everything will be all right. I have paid you off."

My amendment should provide, when she comes to that place that she finds he is not going to go ahead with the marriage, and the immigration officials find both of them have conspired and that the marriage has never been carried out, with the result that the immigration officials have been defrauded, they should have a right to put that man in the deportable class and send him out of the country.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am willing to go as far as I can, but I want to call the gentleman's attention to the language of section 3 of the bill, which clearly states the processes—how the proceeding shall start and how it shall terminate. This language has been accepted by the Department of Labor and has been accepted by the members of the committee on both sides. The committee is simply trying to do its best to find a solution for a number of fraudulent marriages by "counts of no account", by so-called barons and a lot of highbrows, who come from little 2-by-1 countries and get into this country by subterfuge and fraud through marrying attractive American citizens. All we say in the bill is that, upon a decree of a court establishing this fraud, deportation is mandatory. Why does the gentleman want to change that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I am the ranking minority member of the committee, and, as I understand it, I have control of time on the minority side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the fact that unanimous consent having been obtained by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], we are considering this bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, and we are proceeding under the 5-minute rule; therefore the gentleman cannot yield time. He may be recognized for 5 minutes and have his time extended by unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. May I say I do not want to defeat the desire of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] to get plenty of time, because we want to have plenty of time on this bill. There ought to be no hurry about it.

Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment at the end of section 2 to this effect:

When such immigrant refuses to carry out his marital agreements, he shall then become immediately deportable after the approval of the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Suppose the man had not perpetrated any fraud. Would not the method provided in this bill, that the wife must first apply to a court and establish that a fraud has been committed, be the safest way to provide for that?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. My purpose in offering this amendment is to put the amendment in the bill where the language is not perfect at all, so it will be a flag to the Senate when this bill gets over there which will give them to understand the purpose of the House is to clean this thing up. We want these people to understand that this is an important matter, and if they practice fraud they should not profit by it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this bill was reported out of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization by a unanimous vote. I can find no objection to it insofar as it goes. It does not apply to bona-fide marriages which are made between nonquota immigrants and citizens of the United States. However, if it were determined after the marriage that the nonquota immigrant had in mind the perpetration of a fraud in order to obtain a visa to enter the United States, the court then would hold the marriage void from the beginning, and immediately and automatically, under section 3 of this act, such immigrant would become subject to deportation. This bill has no application whatever to bona-fide marriages contracted between foreigners and natives of this country.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. Is it not a fact the bill is in no sense a proposal to let down the bars, but is rather to restrict immigration?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Absolutely so.

I do not think the amendment suggested by my colleague from Ohio would in any way help this legislation. I think, however, his amendment would seriously complicate the bill and probably render it invalid.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If the gentleman from Ohio will let the bill go through without amendment, the committee would be glad to collaborate with him on any amendment he thinks ought to be added, and we will present such amendment to the Senate committee considering the matter at the proper time.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If the committee will permit this amendment, I think it will not hurt anything but will help.

Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JENKINS of Ohio: On page 3, after line 3, insert "When it appears that the immigrant fails and refuses to fulfill his promises for a marital agreement made to procure his entry as an immigrant, he then becomes immediately subject to deportation."

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I think we have gone into this matter far enough. I am not saying this amendment is etymologically perfect, but it is the best I can do at this time. We must not waste time. If there are any corrections to be made on it, they can be made in the Senate.

The purpose of the amendment is to cover this situation: If the woman enters into a fraudulent agreement to marry, she and the man are, of course, both fraudulently so contracting, and the man should be sent out as soon as the fraud is discovered. But if the woman enters into the agreement innocently, and then the man defrauds her, she can resort to the courts of this country to have herself freed. When this has been done, the man ought not to be allowed to walk the streets of this great country, but should be deported.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest a modification of the gentleman's amendment? Where he says "fails and refuses", I suggest the word "or" be substituted for "and."

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is a good suggestion. I accept it. "Fails or refuses."

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Some Members of the House have charged a number of times that I am not bringing out restrictive legislation. Far be it from that. I have always tried to bring about restriction where restriction was necessary. I think this is one of the bills we should pass in its present form.

I call your attention to the language of section 3:

That any alien who at any time after entering the United States is found to have secured either non-quota or preference-quota visa through fraud, by contracting a marriage which, subsequent to entry into the United States, has been judicially annulled retroactively to date of marriage, shall be * * * deported.

I believe the language is proper as it is. I have no objection to accepting the gentleman's amendment, but may I say to the gentlemen who believe in this kind of a restriction, I hope the gentleman will withdraw his amendment and let the language stay as it is, in its proper place and in its proper form, as approved by the Department. If the gentleman insists upon the amendment, I shall offer no objection to it, but I am afraid it will hurt the bill. If the gentleman believes such frauds as this should be restricted, I think for the sake of this legislation he should withdraw his amendment.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with the thoughts which impel the gentleman from Ohio to offer this amendment. As a member of this committee, it is largely my purpose, as it is the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio, to try to restrict the immigration laws rather than to loosen them. However, I am afraid the gentleman in offering his amendment has in the short time he has had to study the bill misconstrued the purpose of it. I am afraid his motives have outweighed his judgment in the brief opportunity he has had to consider the bill.

Section 3 of the bill does exactly what the gentleman has in mind, but the language which he has offered in his amendment is contrary to section 3 and is inconsistent therewith. Therefore, I hope the amendment may be withdrawn, or that, if not withdrawn, it may be voted down.

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STARNES. I think the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] is to safeguard fraudulent entries without waiting for an annulment by the courts; in other words, it would be possible for a couple to enter into a fraudulent conspiracy, and the man or woman who has secured entrance into this country in such manner could not be deported until there had been a judicial annulment of the marriage.

Mr. COLMER. I may say to the gentleman that I did not so construe the amendment.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield?

Mr. DIES. Is it not a fact that under existing law, where there is a conspiracy, the alien is deportable now?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is what I have stated.

Mr. DIES. And under your bill you require a judicial determination of the question of fraud before he is deportable.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Insofar as marriage is concerned.

Mr. DIES. Will simply a divorce decree make him deportable or does the court affirmatively have to find fraud?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The action itself is based upon fraud.

Mr. DIES. But is a mere decree of divorce sufficient?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Any decree of divorce based on fraud will automatically take such alien and send him back to his native land.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I think this amendment should be adopted and I am pleased that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] has indicated he has no serious opposition to it, because we are both trying to do the same thing. Let us allow the amendment to go through, and, if we find that the language is inconsistent, when its gets over to the Senate we can correct it.

The immigration laws of our country are very complex. There is no question about that, and I defy anyone, no matter how expert he may be on immigration law, to take one of these bills or the pending bill and be able to state just how an amendment would apply, because of the complexity of the laws. This bill refers to section after section, and to know how these will intermesh with each other when new legislation is proposed is more than anyone can tell without a chance to study them carefully. This is what my amendment does. It simply provides that whenever any alien is permitted to enter this country upon certain representations as to his present or intended marital relationships, and later it is discovered that he has made misrepresentations, he is then subject to deportation. Why should he not be deported? To whom does he make such misrepresentations? He makes them to the American officials in a foreign country. He deceives our own immigration officials there and as soon as they find he has deceived them or has practiced deceit, why should they not have the authority to say to him, "You have deceived us, you have lied to us, and now you are in the deportable class and we are going to send you back." What is the use of waiting for a court decree? As soon as they find out he has misrepresented basic and cardinal facts in the statement which he has to file, what is the use of temporizing with him? Let us say to him that he cannot act in that way with us, and that we will put him in the deportable class, and when his time comes we will send him back to the country from which he came.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. DIES. Under existing law, in the case of any marriage that is fraudulent, where both parties participated in the fraud, such action makes the alien deportable. As I understand the intention of the gentleman who introduced this bill, it is to make it a deportable offense where only one party is guilty of fraud. What I am wondering about is whether or not, under the language of the bill, the gentleman accomplishes what he has in mind.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I hope I do. I have done the best I can on the spur of the moment; and in any event, this will be a flag to the Senate and the Senate will understand what this House wants done. We give these people a great privilege when we offer them a chance to become American citizens. They cannot trifle with this priceless privilege. Whosoever does cannot complain if his conduct brings down upon his head a withdrawal of the privilege.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last two words.

I do this, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question, if he cares to enlighten me.

Does this bill cover the situation where a nonquota immigrant or a quota immigrant who might be in this country on a visitor's permit and contracts a marriage with an American woman, who afterward would make application for him to remain or stay in the country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It would work both ways. What we were talking about was an alien who marries an American citizen and comes over here to America. The gentleman is now talking about an alien who would come into this country and contract a marriage by fraud.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Exactly.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This does not permit him to stay in this country. He has to go back and the woman would have to bring him back again. She would have to file a petition with the Department of Labor setting forth the facts and he would have to comply with the immigration law. If a man contracted a marriage in this country or abroad only for the purpose to evade the immigration law, he would be subject to deportation.

The pro-forma amendments were withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and there were on a division (demanded by Mr. JENKINS of Ohio)—ayes 58, noes 49.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by my colleague, Mr. ZIMMERMAN, of Missouri, last Friday, on flood control.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION OF COMMITTEE ON RIVERS AND HARBORS TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors I ask unanimous consent that that committee may sit during the sessions of the House today and tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. What bill is the committee considering?

Mr. SMITH of Washington. It is considering a very important bill—the stream-pollution bill—and there are about 50 witnesses who desire to be heard.

Mr. MOTT. It is not considering the Bonneville Dam bill at the present time?

Mr. SMITH of Washington. We are not considering the Bonneville Dam bill at the present time, but we hope to resume hearings on that bill very soon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

CITIZENSHIP LOSS THROUGH VOTING IN FOREIGN STATES

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I call up the bill (H. R. 29) to declare that a citizen of the United States who votes in a political election in a foreign state or who participates in certain voting abroad to determine sovereignty of foreign territory shall lose United States citizenship and nationality.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who is a national of the United States, whether by birth or nationalization, shall lose his nationality by voting hereafter in a political election in a foreign state or by participating in an election or plebiscite to determine the sovereignty over foreign territory.

SEC. 2. Such loss of nationality shall date from the day when voting occurs.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield for the purpose of the gentleman from Ohio offering an amendment?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, before offering the amendment I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question. As I understand it, the bill now under consideration makes no provision with reference to those who participate in the scattering of propaganda.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. And the gentleman has another bill along that line?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I shall not offer any amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TO EXCLUDE HABITUAL ALIEN COMMUTERS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization I call up the bill H. R. 3679, to restrict habitual commuting of aliens from foreign contiguous territory to engage in skilled or unskilled labor or employment in continental United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the bill H. R. 3679, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. BOILEAU. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. Under the rule the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] will kindly take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3679, with Mr. LANHAM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is entitled to 1 hour.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE].

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, this bill (H. R. 3679) to exclude habitual alien commuters was introduced at the request of several of the Members of the House who live on the borders of foreign countries contiguous to the United States, and also at the request of thousands of citizens of the United States who live along those same borders. It seems that during periods of the depression the manufacturers along both borders are violating the rule of fair play in that they give preference to those who come from foreign or contiguous territory and employ them while citizens of the United States are left on the outside.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Was there any evidence to support that contention?

Mr. SCHULTE. There was, to the tune of 20,000 or 30,000 letters, and also from Members of Congress who have protested against the practice.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Is the State Department in favor of the passage of this bill?

Mr. SCHULTE. I know nothing about the attitude of the State Department. I only know that the Representatives of those particular districts are much in sympathy with giving employment to American citizens and excluding aliens.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Was a report made to the committee by the State Department on the bill?

Mr. SCHULTE. I refuse to yield any further. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this has been going on, as I stated before, for a great number of years, and I reiterate the statement that at the request of Members of the House who represent those districts, and who have the interest of their constituents at heart, and who believe that we must take care of our own first, the bill was introduced, and they insist upon its passage.

We find this to be true. Letters have been written regarding this particular piece of legislation. In any number of instances, I will say for the gentleman's information, American citizens have been left standing at the gates while those of a foreign contiguous territory have been invited in to take their jobs. They cross the borders of our country daily to the extent that no one knows the exact number—only those whose jobs they are taking. They say that on the Canadian border alone approximately over 150,000 cross the borders daily. On the Mexican border, I think, there are 250,000.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I refuse to yield further. There are over 250,000 on the Mexican border, with the result that the American people are demanding—and have a right to demand—some kind of protection. We are trying to give them that under this bill.

My interest in this bill is to give jobs to American people. If this bill is passed, there is no question in the minds of the members of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization that we will put over 300,000 American citizens into jobs that are now being held by aliens. That is the sole story. That is the picture and the thought that is behind this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Let us take Detroit, for instance. This bill would prevent the commuter, the man who is buying his home over in Canada and commuting across the river every day for the purpose of working in Detroit, from doing that?

Mr. SCHULTE. That is right. That is exactly what this bill aims to do.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. BEITER. I am happy that this bill is before the House for consideration today. I am one of the Members who appeared before the committee and testified and presented figures to show that in the district which I represent, which adjoins Canada, only having the Peace Bridge between the two countries, hundreds of persons are coming from Canada and working in the department stores and on the street railways, and depriving our people in the district which I represent of those very jobs. As I stated, there are hundreds of Canadians coming into the city of Buffalo and taking these jobs. The figures show that only 47 persons from Buffalo were holding jobs in Canada while the Canadians numbered several hundred.

Mr. SCHULTE. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BEITER. Furthermore, the New York State Assembly has a resolution pending before it now recommending the passage of this bill.

Mr. SCHULTE. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. I am under the impression that there is a larger number of American citizens who find employment daily in Canada all along the border.

Mr. SCHULTE. No. That is an erroneous statement that has been sent out by those who seek to employ foreign born, or those who commute, in preference to the Americans, feeling that it might bring some trade over from the other country.

Mr. ANDREWS. Might I inquire from the gentleman as to whether the State Department has expressed its attitude on this bill?

Mr. SCHULTE. I know nothing about the State Department's attitude on this particular piece of legislation, nor any other piece of legislation.

Mr. ANDREWS. I think an investigation will show that the State Department has approved of the reciprocal relations insofar as they apply to people working on one side and living on the other side.

Mr. SCHULTE. I will say to the gentleman that I have received letters from the city of Buffalo, from the city of Detroit, and those cities that are contiguous to the foreign countries. They are protesting, and they have a right to protest when they can see boatload after boatload crossing the Detroit River, others going across on the ferries, going to their daily jobs in the United States, and when the whistle blows at night they go back home with their pay envelopes, mind you, and they do not contribute a 5-cent piece to the upkeep of the institutions of this country or to this Government.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask by what authority such commuters get into the country now?

Mr. SCHULTE. There seems to be an agreement between the immigration officials of both countries to allow this to happen, with the result that those who come over are given what is called an identification card, which permits them to cross the border daily.

The reason I have introduced this bill is at the request of those people who are being injured by foreign commuters coming in here and taking their jobs.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's bill. I do not know of any Americans who are working in Canada, but one phase of this question has been brought to my notice. It is not a very difficult phase, in my judgment. That is, the taking of domestic servants by Americans into Canadian territory to their summer homes, and vice versa. The gentleman sees the problem that is created by that. Would the gentleman, at the proper time, think it appropriate to permit an amendment to exempt domestic servants from the operation of this legislation?

Mr. SCHULTE. I will say to the gentleman that is a highly controversial question. Some of those may interpret the law in the wrong spirit and then employ them over here as domestic servants.

Mr. CULKIN. I am anxious to safeguard it, but the gentleman can see the problem that is created in any household moving temporarily to Canada for the summer, dislocating their domestic establishment, and the contrary situation that exists as to Canadians, many of whom come into the United States.

Mr. SCHULTE. I shall be pleased to consider any amendment the gentleman may offer.

Mr. CULKIN. I think everybody will join in that, and I know that it will save the Members a vast deal of petty annoyance.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. BEITER. The very situation of which the gentleman speaks exists at the present time. Americans are not permitted to take their housemaids or servants over into Canada at the summer resorts and permit them to work there; they must employ Canadians in their own homes or in their summer resorts on Canadian shores.

Mr. CULKIN. I do not mean the commercial phases; I just mean the family that is going into Canada for the summer, not for commercial purposes, not to run a hotel, but merely to live there during the summer season.

Mr. BEITER. That is what I am referring to also.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Would this affect the President going to his summer home in Canada and taking his servants with him?

Mr. BEITER. The Canadian laws stop that, not the American laws.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Let me ask the gentleman a hypothetical question: Would this bill cover the case of an attorney at law or a doctor in Canada coming into this country from time to time, say, once a week or once a month, on some matter on which his talent was required? Would that be covered by this act?

Mr. SCHULTE. No; I may say to the gentleman from California that this bill is designed to exclude the habitual commuter who comes over here and accepts a job in commerce or industry.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I took occasion to look up in the dictionary the meaning of the word "habitual." It means that accustomed thing, the accustomed practice. Now, if he came in from time to time, would he not be subject to the application of the bill if it became law?

Mr. DIES. In this connection with the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. Certainly.

Mr. DIES. Does not this bill apply solely to skilled or unskilled labor?

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. DIES. It does not apply to professional people?

Mr. SCHULTE. No.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further, for I have only a few minutes. I do hope the Members will see the bill in the same light that we, the members of the Committee on Immigration, have seen it, to the extent that it was voted out of committee unanimously. This same piece of legislation passed one branch of Congress during the last session, but it was held up in the House on the Consent Calendar. We are bringing it up for consideration today in the hope that every Member will realize and appreciate the hardship that is being worked on American citizens now living in the United States who are trying to do their share in the upkeep and upbuilding of this great country. The only protection they will have will be that afforded by this particular piece of legislation. I hope the members of this Committee will see that the bill passes in its present form. [Applause.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any minority member of the committee opposed to the bill?

Is the gentleman from Wisconsin opposed to the bill?

Mr. BOILEAU. At the present time I am, at least until I know more about it, I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear that I do not know at this moment whether I am opposed to this bill or not; for, frankly, I have not had an opportunity to study it. It seems to me, however, that there are some very serious implications in the bill. I objected to its being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole because I think we should discuss the bill at greater length.

Section 2 of the bill is particularly obnoxious to me, but I am frank to admit that that may be because I do not understand it. This section reads as follows:

SEC. 2. The words "alien", "foreigner", and "citizen of any foreign country, nation, or colony" shall be construed to mean any person who has his residence in said foreign country, nation, or possession or colony of a foreign country.

This provision means, if I understand it aright, that an American citizen living in Canada or in Mexico, although he is an American citizen, shall be construed to be an alien or a foreigner or a citizen of a foreign country.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman refers, in section 2, to the language "citizen of any foreign country." An American cannot at the same time be a citizen of America and a citizen of a foreign country.

Mr. BOILEAU. I appreciate the meaning of the words "alien" and "foreigner" as used in this bill, but the bill also states that a "citizen of any foreign country, nation, or colony" shall be construed to mean any person who is a resident in said foreign country, nation, or possession or colony of a foreign nation. It seems to me, therefore, that under the terms of this bill an American citizen who lives in Canada or Mexico would be construed to be either an alien or a foreigner or a citizen of a foreign country.

Perhaps it is all right to prohibit American citizens living in Canada from coming over here and working, but if we are going to do that let us say so in so many words. Let us not include that class of American citizens in a blanket clause in which we define a group of aliens, foreigners, or citizens of a foreign country.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I agree with the gentleman that this ought to be clarified. Of course, if it includes a lawyer practicing law in Detroit who has a home across the river, and that lawyer would then be considered a foreigner, then we understand it. But if it does not mean that, section 2 should be changed and the sixth line altered and instead of saying "any person" the word "alien" should be substituted for the word "person." It should apply to any alien who has his residence in any foreign country.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman's suggestion is a good one. If it does not mean what I fear it means, we might as well strike out the whole section, because the words "alien, foreign citizen, or citizen of a foreign country" should explain themselves, and unless it means what I fear it does mean, I do not see any necessity for the language in that section at all.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. There are real friends of this bill in the House today and if this definition is allowed to stand, it will render the bill unconstitutional and is liable to give us no law whatsoever when it is tested in court. It would be best to have a saving clause in there saving American citizens or citizens of the United States. If we had that saving clause in there, the law would be all right, and it would likely become law.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. I quite agree with what the gentleman from California said and the possibility he mentioned. But we have a condition in Detroit, for instance, where one can buy a cheap home across the river. American citizens can go across the river in less time than you can go from here to the Wardman Park Hotel. They live under cheap tax conditions, in cheap homes, and work in the Detroit factories. That is the situation we want to stop.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. This law does not attempt to make a foreigner out of an American citizen, but it does attempt to say, for the purpose of this act, that an American shall be treated the same as a foreigner.

Mr. SCHULTE. That is the proper construction of the bill.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. That is exactly what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] is pointing out. We should honestly state the situation. We should say Americans who live on that side, and then it might be good law. It is a Canadian problem whether or not they want them over there.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the gentleman from Indiana concur in the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER]?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes; I do.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is it the purpose of this bill to say to an American citizen who happens to live in Canada that he cannot come back and forth and commute across the international boundary?

Mr. SCHULTE. If he comes under the particular construction which this law places upon that, he is absolutely in violation of his citizenship of this country, and I agree with the gentleman from Michigan. What we are trying to do is make those fellows American citizens or make them foreigners and make them stay out of here.

Mr. BOILEAU. I am trying to clarify the issue, and I believe we understand each other now. What the committee intends to do is to say that American citizens cannot work in the United States if, perchance, they happen to have a residence either in Mexico or Canada?

Mr. SCHULTE. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin he is absolutely right. As the gentleman from Michigan so ably said, there are any number of Americans who are taking advantage of the situation of cheap rent, cheap light, and cheap everything else in foreign countries. They live over there and work in the United States, and still labor over here under the guise of American citizens. I may say to the gentleman we are aiming at those very fellows by this bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. Let us take another situation. Assume an American citizen has a summer cottage in Canada or a summer home in Mexico and for 3 months of the year or 6 months of the year he habitually crosses the international boundary line from his summer residence to come to work in the United States. Could he continue to do that?

Mr. SCHULTE. No; he could not.

Mr. BOILEAU. In other words, he cannot have his summer home up there either?

Mr. SCHULTE. No.

Mr. BOILEAU. He must live in the United States all of the time?

Mr. SCHULTE. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that is absolutely right. There is no question but what it will work a hardship on probably not over 5,000 at the outside, whereas the situation now existing is working a hardship on practically 350,000 people. So, from the standpoint of number, there are more Americans who will be benefited than injured by this piece of legislation.

Mr. BOILEAU. May I say to the gentleman I do not mean to infer the committee has not given this bill adequate study. I assume that has been done. May I ask the gentleman to state whether or not this bill has the approval of the Department of Labor or the Department of State?

Mr. SCHULTE. I do not know what stand those Departments have taken. The gentleman may refer to the hearings to find out. We have had extensive hearings on this particular piece of legislation, both last year and the year before, as well as this year.

Mr. BOILEAU. There is a custom here in the House—and I am not saying it is a good custom—to include in the report the opinion of the Department. I am not one who claims that the Departments are always right and that we should follow their dictates. But in a matter of this kind the Department should be asked to give an opinion. In view of the fact the gentleman from Indiana does not know whether either or both of these Departments have given an opinion, may I ask the chairman of the Immigration Committee whether the Labor Department or State Department has been requested to give an opinion; and if so, have they given an opinion?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Before I answer the gentleman's question, I would like to clear up something for the information of the House.

Mr. BOILEAU. The gentleman may use my time in doing so if he wishes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may desire, so that the situation may be clarified.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The committee has given this matter serious consideration for the last 2 or 3 years.

I am not participating in this debate. I merely want to clarify something for the House.

We found an American cannot go into Canada to work for 1 hour or 1 day. We found there is not a chance for an American to cross the border when he says he is going into Canada to work. He has to take his bag and go back to his own home.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the law prohibit him from doing that, or is that because the industries there are more loyal to their own country?

Mr. ANDREWS. I think the gentleman from New York is quite incorrect in his statement.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am talking about the Canadian law. We found there are many so-called Americans who do not want to pay any taxes and help carry the burdens of this country, who have bought little homes on the other side of the border, though they have life jobs on our side. Some of these people are so cheap they even bring their coffee with them from Canada. They would not even buy a cup of coffee here.

Mr. BOILEAU. I thought the gentleman was going to answer my question as to whether or not the State Department and the Labor Department have been asked for an opinion.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The Labor Department did not participate in the consideration of the matter or make any recommendation.

Mr. BOILEAU. Were they asked for an opinion or for recommendations?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not think they were asked for an opinion. Although the State Department did not appear in connection with this last hearing, I believe they have some sort of an objection. But the committee, knowing that, after a careful study of the whole situation, and a check of the millions of dollars that are leaving this country which never come back, and the thousands of Americans who are out of employment at a time when Americans cannot work 1 hour in Canada, felt unanimously they ought to have this sort of legislation.

Mr. BOILEAU. I do not want to be discourteous to the gentleman, but I would like to ask just one question——

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is never discourteous.

Mr. BOILEAU. As to whether or not the laws of Canada or the laws of Mexico prohibit American citizens from accepting opportunities to work or whether their inability to find employment is because the employers in these respective countries are more loyal to their own workers and give preference to their own citizens. Does the gentleman know whether or not this is a matter of law?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes. I can say to the gentleman an American has no chance to go in there and do one day's work. It is prohibited.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, I am under the impression that some rather misleading statements have been made, because it is a fact that a very large number of American citizens go daily into Canada and are employed in business, which is largely American owned, particularly in the Buffalo-Niagara Falls area.

I am also quite convinced in my own mind from investigation that a very large number of the people, presumably Canadians, who come into this country daily from Canada, are American citizens living in Canada during the year, either part time or all time.

Mr. BOILEAU. If that statement is true—and I accept the gentleman's statement about it as being the truth—the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] must be entirely mistaken, then.

Mr. ANDREWS. I may also state I have seen direct indications that the State Department has a definite reciprocal agreement insofar as labor going in both directions is concerned, and it is my direct understanding the State Department is opposed to the passage of this bill.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to my colleague from Wisconsin.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I notice in the report on page 3 these words:

> Thus it will be seen that during public hearings on this measure neither the Department of Labor nor the Department of State entered positive opposition to this bill; they suggested amendments and a substitute measure which latter did not meet the approval of the committee.

Let us hear what those amendments were, so we may get a little information as to what the State Department wants on this subject.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KRAMER. In reply to the question the gentleman asked as to an American going into Mexican territory to seek employment, may I say that an employee on a railroad who goes into Mexico must leave the train at the border, whereas a Mexican train crew can come into the United States, in some instances going as far as the terminal in St. Louis. Any American going from California, Texas, or any of the border States is prohibited from accepting employment in Mexico.

Mr. BOILEAU. The fact remains undisputed there are hundreds of thousands of American citizens who are working in Canada and working in Mexico while living in the United States.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin, the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman who is the author of the bill. I am reading lines 7, 8, and 9 of the first page—

> Shall be permitted to habitually cross said international boundary line for the purpose of seeking employment, or engaging in any employment, vocation, or trade, either as skilled or unskilled labor employment.

Do not the words "skilled or unskilled" modify this language, and does it not mean that it applies only to skilled and unskilled work?

Mr. SCHULTE. That is all. It applies to skilled and unskilled employment.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. And it does not apply to lawyers or visitors going into Canada?

Mr. SCHULTE. It does not.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is what I thought the bill intended, in the first instance, and that is the reason I have always supported it. I have supported it because it will hold thousands of American jobs for Americans. I now understand that it does not apply to professional men or businessmen or visitors or transients going into Canada.

Mr. SCHULTE. The bill applies strictly to those employed or seeking employment in the United States.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. As skilled or unskilled labor?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. What is the purpose of the language "in any employment, vocation, or trade"?

Mr. SCHULTE. There are some highly skilled technicians in certain lines of work, such as machinists, electricians, and men of that type, who might come within the category just referred to by the gentleman.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I should like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if it is his intention to offer an amendment striking out section 2.

Mr. BOILEAU. I shall offer that amendment.

Mr. MOTT. I think the gentleman is to be congratulated for discovering and uncovering what seems to be a joker here. I am of the opinion that it is wrong for Americans working in this country to have their residence in Canada, but when you undertake to remedy that situation by law you are running into difficulties, and I may say that in my own humble opinion, if this bill should be enacted with section 2 in it, the Supreme Court would hold it to be unconstitutional even if the bill did not become law until after the President's reorganization plan went into effect.

Mr. MICHENER. I think the gentleman from California has an amendment which he will offer that will take care of that situation.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO].

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Chairman, this bill appeared upon the Consent Calendar sometime ago and while on that calendar it was objected to and finally stricken from the Consent Calendar. The principal reasons for our objecting to the bill at that time were due to the fact that there appeared in the committee report no information at all from any of the departments of the Government indicating how the Government departments might feel regarding legislation of this character.

We therefore consulted the Department of State, because that was the principal department of Government that would be affected by such legislation, and in response to a telephone conversation I had with Mr. Carr, of the Department of State, he agreed to prepare for me a memorandum concerning this legislation and setting forth the views of the Department in regard to this proposed measure. These views of the Department express their objections to this proposed legislation.

As you will note from the committee report, they give figures on page 3, showing the conditions that existed in 1933 on the Canadian border and on the Mexican border, showing how many American citizens were crossing these borders and how many aliens were coming into this country across these borders.

I call your attention to the fact that back in 1927, when the agitation first arose for legislation to prevent these commuters from crossing the border, there were 14,500 aliens crossing the Canadian border. Today, on the Canadian border there are only 2,032 commuters.

These are the figures which I received only a matter of a couple of weeks ago. Of this number, 1,296 aliens are in the Detroit area, and there are 1,536 alien commuters on the entire Mexican border.

This matter has been the subject of discussion between the Department of State of this country and the Canadian Government, and amicable agreements have been entered into and the matter has been taken care of and, as a result, the immigration is not, today, a problem as it was some years ago.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COSTELLO. In a moment.

At the present time if an alien wishes to get into this country, he must have an immigration visa, which allows him to cross the border for a definite period of time. If such a commuter has such an immigration visa, this legislation will not affect him. The only ones to be affected are those few who are now crossing the border without such a visa.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Has the gentleman any proof to offer to the House that any reciprocal agreement has been entered into with regard to immigration?

Mr. COSTELLO. No reciprocal agreement has been entered into, but the matter has been discussed between the two governments, and it has been worked out to the satisfaction of both governments.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not think so.

Mr. COSTELLO. As a result these immigration visas are being issued to citizens of the different countries.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. PLUMLEY. In view of the statement which the gentleman has just made, is it not a fact that this proposed legislation is useless, unnecessary, and discriminatory as against a very few people, and those Americans?

Mr. COSTELLO. I would say this legislation would affect equally Americans as well as aliens. In other words, the number of people to be affected would be about the same in the different countries.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I decline to yield for a moment. In view of the fact that I made the statement that this would affect the citizens of both countries, I want to state that there are 310 Americans commuting daily to Canada and 347 to Mexico. These people are principally high-salaried executives. This legislation would prevent their commuting. On the other hand, you have approximately 820 American citizens commuting to the United States from Canada. The number from Mexico is 612. In other words, the total number of people who are to be affected by this legislation is negligible. Actually you would not be creating jobs, as has been mentioned here, because the effect would be possibly to cause an exchange of residence between 310 Americans on this side of the Canadian border with 820 Americans on the other side. In other words, those living in Canada and working in the United States would be compelled to take up their residence in the United States, and those living in the United States and working in Canada would be compelled to move to Canada and take up their residence. Your net gain would be practically negligible. Further, this legislation, if enacted, would undoubtedly cause retaliatory legislation on the part of Canada and Mexico. What the nature of that legislation might be we are not able to hazard a guess, but undoubtedly, if we legislate here in this manner, the other Governments are going to resent our action and will take other measures to retaliate against us.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. SCHULTE. Does the gentleman know that Canadian laws prohibit us from going in there? Does the gentleman know that Mexican laws prohibit an American from going into Mexico and working there?

Mr. COSTELLO. It is known that some of our American citizens are going to Canada and working there.

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman wants to be fair and wants to give jobs to Americans. I appreciate that, but the gentleman ought to determine whether Americans are discriminated against by the laws of Canada and Mexico. When an American attempts to go into Mexico he is placed in an embarrassing position in the first place, and then he must tell how much money he has.

Mr. COSTELLO. We have a number of Americans going into Canada and into Mexico at the present time. I am not familiar with the particular provisions of the immigration laws of either of those countries.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. WITHROW. I cannot understand how it is possible for American citizens to go into Canada and work there if the Canadian law prohibits them from working there. It does not square up. I think it is a burden which is upon the shoulders of the chairman of the Committee on Immigration, before we pass upon this legislation, which is very important, to produce that law and show us that his position squares up with what is taking place in Canada and in Mexico, and until he does that I believe it is the duty of every Member of this House to oppose this legislation.

Mr. COSTELLO. In the report here there is the following statement:

> Canada and Mexico has no special prohibition directed against daily commuting.

And that is the kind of legislation that we would put into effect here; namely, special legislation against daily commuting, when neither Canada nor Mexico has such legislation as we are attempting to enact.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. PLUMLEY. From whom did the gentleman just quote?

Mr. COSTELLO. From a statement to me by Mr. Carr, Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. BERNARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. BERNARD. In my congressional district, which includes the city of International Falls, on the Canadian boundary, many American citizens cross daily into Fort Francis, Canada, to work.

Mr. COSTELLO. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. Yes.

Mr. KRAMER. The gentleman made a statement with reference to the table on page 3 of the report. Does the gentleman question the authenticity of the report that the table has been taken from?

Mr. COSTELLO. I am not questioning the authenticity of the report. I simply call attention of the Members here to those figures.

These are the figures for 1933.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I yield.

Mr. KRAMER. Those are figures furnished by the Department of Labor. I would say for the information of the gentleman that they are not even complete. There are more going over the borders than they set out in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO] has expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from California 2 additional minutes.

Mr. COSTELLO. In answer to the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER], in 1927 there were 14,500 commuters. At the present time the report only shows 2,033. The figures give the total number who were commuting in 1933. That is the reason I wished to call the attention of the members of the Committee to these figures. The fact is that the evil that existed some years ago has been gradually diminishing until today it only affects some 2,000 people. In other words, it is a negligible quota. If it affected 150,000 or 300,000, as has been stated, then it would be a serious problem; but I want to emphasize the fact that it only concerns a limited number, not in excess of 2,033, as set forth in the figures submitted to me by the State Department.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I yield.

Mr. SCOTT. Did the gentleman make the statement that the State Department was opposed to this bill?

Mr. COSTELLO. This statement is the statement of their objections to the passage of this legislation. They are particularly opposed to the bill because they fear it may also interfere with their program of reciprocal trade agreements that has been worked out between the United States and Canada, as well as other British countries.

Mr. SCHNEIDER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I yield.

Mr. SCHNEIDER of Wisconsin. The State Department, according to the records, has opposed every immigration act that this House has enacted in the past 10 years. Therefore, they are as right on this as they were wrong in their opposition to all of the legislation enacted by this Congress.

Mr. COSTELLO. I leave that to the members of the Committee to decide.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute. I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW] rather placed an imposition upon the chairman of this committee to bring in the laws of Mexico and Canada. If the gentleman is so interested, he can go down to the library and find it himself. The chairman tells you, and I have repeated it several times, that there are restrictions against Americans working in Canada and Mexico. Either you take the word of the chairman or look for the law yourself.

I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON].

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, subject to two or three amendments that I anticipate will be adopted, this, in my judgment, is a very meritorious bill.

I have been interested in the unusual concern that seems to have been manifested in some quarters for some of our rich people who summer either in Canada or Mexico, and likewise the concern that has been manifested in behalf of a lot of rich American taxpayers who see fit to build their homes in another country. I am not speaking for the rich, with a fine summer home, or for the tax evader. I want to say a word for the American laborer, who only asks for a job.

I do not want to discuss the technicalities of the bill, although I think section 2 probably ought to go out, but I want to discuss with you what I have personal knowledge of as a very practical proposition.

I live in the city of El Paso, the largest city on the Mexican border. In that long expanse of country of some 2,500 miles from San Diego, Calif., to Brownsville, Tex., mine is the only city of more than 100,000 people. I entertain the very friendliest relations with the people of Mexico, those whom I know, both in official life, as well as the citizens of the city of Juarez, just across the line from El Paso, and also in the city of Chihuahua. The Mexicans are a kindly people. They love children, music, and flowers. I count many of them among my friends; but I want to say a word for American citizens whether native or naturalized.

If you will pardon a personal allusion, I was mayor of El Paso for some years before coming to Congress, and I know something first-hand about conditions that exist in that part of the country. Let it be understood at the outset that this bill does not apply to seasonal labor for farmers and ranchers. It does not cover businessmen residing in the United States who make occasional visits to Mexico or Canada to look after their business or investments. It applies to the poor Mexican laborer who comes into our country day by day to work for whatever he can get and deprives some good American citizen of the job he ought to have.

This bill is at least a step in the right direction. There are a great many people of Mexican nationality in my city. Many were born there and many have been naturalized. They are treated courteously and in a friendly way by everybody. They are good citizens and accorded every right and privilege that any of us receive. Their children attend our schools and they receive treatment at our hospitals. They have been and are my friends and I am theirs. I refer now to aliens, and I do not care if they come from Mexico or some other country. I do not want them coming into our country and taking the jobs of our own people. In other words, I am for Americans first. You Members who talk so much about friendship for the American laboring man, we will give you an opportunity to help out this committee by supporting what I know of my own personal knowledge is a very meritorious bill, at least in principle.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I appreciate what the gentleman has to say. I have been in his city, I have been in Juarez, I know exactly what he has in mind in that respect; but let me ask him whether in his city there are any appreciable number of these rich people or anybody else who want to go down into Mexico?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. Very few. The only men of that type would be businessmen supervising the operation of some railroad, industry, or mine in Mexico, who, maybe, would go there occasionally.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. But the people do not live over there?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. No; they have their homes in El Paso or some other place in this country.

The opponents of this bill talk about reciprocity. I am for reciprocity. Those people are my neighbors. I get along with them. I have done it personally and officially for more than 25 years; but that talk about reciprocity is without merit, and the reason I know that is that no American can get a job in any Mexican industry, because there is a law in Mexico that requires 90 percent of the employees to be Mexicans. The truth is that it is in practice 100 percent. Let an American citizen try these days to get a job in Mexico, or any other country, and see how far he gets.

Mexicans come into this country and are given employment simply because they will work for anything they can get. They take the jobs of American men and women who are entitled to a living wage, whatever it may be; they take the places of good American citizens. I believe in decent wages and decent living conditions and with preference always to our own people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS. In the gentleman's country the shoe fits one foot, but what about the plain, ordinary American workingman living in my district who has a job in Canada and who is allowed to go there by the Canadian Government?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I would not want to work any hardship on him.

If this reciprocity about which they talk so much has any merit or is working out from a practical standpoint, that would help solve the gentleman's situation in Buffalo. As I said in the beginning, I am keeping in mind my own local situation, because I know what it is all about; and I am just as certain as I can be that some kind of relief ought to be afforded by the Congress. I think the State Department ought to give it encouragement and try to work out this problem on a friendly and statesmanlike basis. I am convinced, however, that there are literally hundreds and, I believe, thousands of American citizens who have lost their jobs to aliens.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. COLDEN. Is it not a fact that in all the border States a great many American citizens are on relief? These jobs would be better filled by Americans than by foreigners.

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. Literally hundreds and, I believe, thousands. Why vote huge sums of money here for relief when thousands of aliens are on the rolls and thousands more are holding jobs that Americans should have?

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I thought the chairman of the committee did not make it quite clear why officials of the State Department were not asked to give testimony on this bill. Would the gentleman enlighten us a little?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I am not a member of the Committee on Immigration. I do not know a thing in the world about what took place in the committee. Please do not charge me with that. [Laughter.] All I know, I say to my friend from Oregon, is that I think there is a lot of merit in this bill and that it ought to pass this House, for it will help the American workman who has had his job taken away by some alien. I do not know whether that is true on the Canadian border, but I do know that it is true on the Mexican border.

Mr. MOTT. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that I have no objection to his bill.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. SCHULTE. Gentlemen opposing the bill quoted the State Department as saying that only 600 aliens crossed the border a day seeking employment or commuting.

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I would guess that more than that number pass over the bridge every day between El Paso and Juarez. I know that along the Mexican border in my part of the country, not only in the cities but in the smaller towns, there are literally hundreds and perhaps thousands of aliens who have been taking the jobs of the American workingman. All I have to say to the friends of labor and friends of the American workingman in this House is, support this bill or something like it. Let it go to conference, let it go to the State Department if they have the interest in it that we hope and believe they have. Let us work out something to stop these thousands of people coming in here and taking the jobs of our citizens. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. May I clarify one proposition? As the gentleman stated, the people who come over to work on this side do not get any visas or passports. All they have is a little identification card. They come in to work and go back home. We are not quarreling with those who have visas from consuls. It is only those people who have never lived in this country, or perhaps they might have been citizens 10 or 15 years ago, and in my opinion they ought to cancel their citizenship if they are still holding naturalization papers.

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I think what the gentleman has just stated is true.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield so that I may ask the chairman of the Immigration Committee a question?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman from Texas has yielded for the purpose of allowing me to ask the chairman of the Immigration Committee the question I asked the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. What is the question?

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman tell us why the officials of the State Department were not asked to appear before the committee as witnesses in the committee's consideration of this bill? I rather thought that was important.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. About 2 years ago we did ask the State Department to come up here, and they did so. The officials of that Department thought they might work out something. They did work out reciprocal agreements insofar as everybody else is concerned except the matter of labor in Canada and labor in the United States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] 5 additional minutes.

This is more or less of a gentleman's agreement, but that gentleman's agreement, in my opinion, has gone too far. In other words, Americans cannot enter Canada or Mexico to do work of any kind; on the other hand, we are on the receiving side and these people come in with little identification cards. They do not pay any taxes. They do not pay anything at all. They come to work in the morning, bring their lunches and go back home at night. They do not pay $1 of taxes and they are taking from $6,000,000 to $10,000,000 from this country every week.

Mr. MOTT. Would the gentleman object to an amendment striking out section 2?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. My purpose here is to cooperate with the Members of the House. If that is the sentiment of the Members of the House, I am willing to cooperate.

Mr. MOTT. I think with section 2 stricken out I can support the bill.

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made about this gentlemen's agreement with these countries with reference to reciprocity, let me give another illustration of how that works, or rather how it does not work. I have been down into Mexico a good deal. When you hit the border at Laredo or El Paso your train crew gets off that train the minute the train hits the border. You do not see any American railroad engineers, firemen, or brakemen going on into Mexico on that train, whether it be El Paso or Laredo.

Speaking of the subject of reciprocity, I claim it does not work. Yet when the trains from Mexico come into El Paso the Mexican crew comes on up into the city of El Paso and to the depot where Santa Fe and Southern Pacific and other railroad boys are literally begging for jobs. That Mexican crew brings that train on up into the Union Station in the city of El Paso, United States of America. That is another reason why I am in favor of this kind of legislation. There is no reciprocity about it. If American railroad employees cannot take those trains into Juarez and do the switching and spotting of the cars, then the Mexican crews should also be compelled to leave the trains at the border and let American citizens do the work on this side.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE].

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, may I say here and now that when the bill is being read under the 5-minute rule I intend to offer an amendment striking out all of section 2, which I hope will relieve the anxiety of those who have been so bitterly opposed to this particular piece of legislation.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of discussion in connection with this measure, and while I am not opposed to the bill, I do believe there have been arguments advanced here that are rather indefinite, particularly the arguments made by the chairman of the Immigration Committee. A few minutes ago I asked the gentleman from California to yield to me, which he did. I directed a question to the chairman of the Immigration Committee asking him to tell us something of the law he claims exists in the Dominion of Canada and in Mexico which prohibits Americans from being employed in Canada and likewise in Mexico. Prior to advancing this argument the gentleman had stated that he wanted to clarify everything.

If this measure is going to be enacted into law and we are going to predicate our action today upon a false premise, this is a good time to know whether or not that premise is false.

I have here a statement from Mr. Carr, Assistant Secretary of State, which reads as follows, and I wish the chairman of the committee would follow me:

> Canada and Mexico have no special prohibition directed against daily commuting. It is fairly obvious that any prohibition on our part would inevitably lead to retaliation. Retaliatory measures would seriously handicap American commuters crossing the border to their work, and would cut off a profitable trade due to their normal expenditures in this country.

May I say at this time, and I believe I am on a sound premise when I ask that the chairman of this committee, who has guided the bill, presided over the hearings, the one who should know, that he step forward and give us some definite information as to the laws of the Dominion of Canada and of Mexico. He has stated, "I ought to know." I will remind him of the fact I am not on his committee. If I were, I believe I would know. If he knows, I believe he should tell us now and quote the law, because we are entitled to have the information, because the statements made on the floor conflict upon this subject, upon this certain phase of the argument.

I believe in asking him this question I am well within my rights as an individual Member of the House of Representatives. I may say in reply to his remarks that if I advanced an argument upon the floor of this House I would be willing and anxious to substantiate it by producing the law. As a matter of fact, I feel he was very indefinite and misleading in his statements and has not clarified a single, solitary argument. I believe it is his duty to produce at this time something tangible, so we may clear up this phase of the argument. [Applause.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished proponent of this bill relieved my mind somewhat by his statement that he was going to offer an amendment to strike out section 2. May I say I am myself a vigorous national and am in sympathy with the general purpose of the bill. I am, however, apprehensive of any legislation which will disrupt the 150 years of peace we have had with Canada. The people of Canada are splendid people and have a kinship with us in language and blood.

I am particularly concerned, assuming the House does not see fit to strike out section 2, that it would interfere seriously with the recreation and the health of the distinguished gentleman who at present occupies the White House. He has a summer home in Canada, at Campobello Island, as I remember it. He, too, would come under the condemnation of this bill when he went to Canada to seek health and recreation.

There were 28,000,000 people in the United States in the last election who said he was skilled. There were 17,000,000 who said he was unskilled. He surely comes within one category or the other. It would seem, in order that the President might have proper recreation away from his great duties unrestrained by the operation of this bill, that it is vitally important the amendment striking out section 2 should prevail.

It is obvious, if this bill is passed in its present form, that during the absence of the President in his summer home in Canada, whether or not he is skilled or unskilled, he would be off the pay roll. Apprehensive of the effect of this amendment upon the President's recreation, and speaking from the Republican side, I wish to say, if that amendment is adopted, I am going to support the bill.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman will also recall that the last time the President went to Canada he made it very emphatic that he did not want the natives to refer to him as a foreigner.

Mr. CULKIN. I think I recall that. Of course, I do not object to that graceful gesture. That was timely. I do object, however, to one of the results of that visit, which brought about giving part of the markets of the American dairyman to the Canadian dairyman. I do not enjoy that, and do not approve of it.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BEITER. There is nothing in the gentleman's mind——

Mr. CULKIN. Do not put any statement in my mouth. Ask me a question, please.

Mr. BEITER. All right, then. Since March of 1933, is there any doubt in the gentleman's mind about the gentleman who occupies the White House being a skilled man?

Mr. CULKIN. Sometimes I have had serious doubt about it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I asked time of the opposition, thinking I might want to vote that way. I do not know but that my mind has been changed in the last few minutes. I understand there has been a proposal made to strike out section 2. I hope it may be struck out. I felt that it is one of the defects of the bill. I do not like that definition of "foreigner" contained in it. For that matter, I must disagree with my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. CULKIN]. I do not agree with his definition of "foreigner" any better than I do his definition of "skilled" or "unskilled" workman.

I, too, come from the southern border. I do not represent so large a city as El Paso, but we have the same problems. However, I think in fairness to my business constituency I must call your attention to the fact that various chambers of commerce down on the Rio Grande, as well as on the Mexico-Arizona border, have asked me to oppose this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I think chambers of commerce at Nogales and other border towns would like to have me oppose it, partly because they are getting cheap labor from across the line, but I think, partly, for "good-neighbor reasons" too, because this measure enacted into law would interfere with our "good-neighbor policy" and that it would have some bad effects upon trade.

Mr. Chairman, I do feel that some Americans are being deprived of employment because their places are being filled by those who cross the border. Labor on the border wants this bill passed. I may say to the distinguished chairman that I am with him in about 90 percent of his proposals. I do not believe, however, we are hitting at the heart of the matter of foreign labor competition when we cut out the crossing of the border by these commuters. They cannot travel very far in order to receive employment profitably.

I am with the chairman of the Committee on Immigration in his desire to give employment to and save our employment for Americans, in contradistinction to aliens, throughout the country generally. I am constrained to favor this measure when amended. [Applause.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY].

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of my constituency I ought to say to the House that along the line between Canada and Vermont are several towns through which the line passes. It is a peculiar situation which develops therefore, and particularly interesting.

I know of hundreds—not thousands, because thousands are not involved in this matter—but I know of hundreds of Americans who work daily in Canada. I know of hundreds of Canadians who come across the line in these towns through which the line runs and are profitably employed, and to pass this bill, which is discriminatory because of the few involved, will work a hardship on more Americans than it will help, and it is also un-American in principle and will be so in its results. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDRESEN].

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the motive which actuates the passage of this bill is very worthy of consideration. The primary objective, as I see it, is to first provide work in this country for American citizens. In looking at the legislation and the policies of the administration at the present time, I think we can all safely say that the passage of a bill of this character is a mere gesture, for under the present trade policies of the administration we are providing work in foreign countries for from 5,000,000 to 8,000,000 foreigners so they can produce farm and manufactured products to ship into the United States and take away work from our American laborers and farmers.

So what we do here today in excluding a few thousand foreigners and preventing them from coming in here and working in our factories means nothing when at the same time we have a policy which permits the American people to purchase the competitive commodities produced by millions of foreign workers for shipment and then sale in the United States in direct competition with what we produce here.

We still have the unemployment policy with us. The statistics from the various bureaus that claim to know the situation state we have at least 8,000,000 or 9,000,000 unemployed in the United States, with from 15,000,000 to 16,000,000 American citizens on relief. If we are to get at the fundamentals of our difficulties so as to bring work to our own people, then we should certainly protect and preserve the American market for the men and women in this country who are now unemployed. I think this is the real problem for us to consider.

While I am going to vote for this legislation, I think it is only a gesture. Let us tackle the real problem and give work to American people who are now on the relief rolls and are walking our streets, despite the prosperity which the administration states has returned to this country, so we may again have all of our individuals gainfully occupied in private industry. [Applause.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a statement about the situation in Minnesota, and in respect to the International Falls-Fort Francis, Canada, situation. I am not against the bill, but I am doubtful if it will not work a hardship without some sort of a corrective amendment, because there is the greatest friendship between the American and the Canadian side. There are 8,000 people in International Falls, Minn., and about half that number in the Canadian city of Fort Francis. Each day the citizens go back and forth freely from one side to the other. There seems to be no boundary line, and there is the friendliest relationship. There is no fort protected boundary. I am not so sure but that this bill will work a hardship, and I am wondering whether the committee has considered an amendment that would correct this defect, so far as it applies to the northern border, between friendly Canada and the United States.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Minnesota, we have given this bill a great deal of consideration. We went into all phases of it, and while we realize and appreciate the fact and anticipated some of the statements that would be made here, that there would be just a negligible amount of people crossing the borders, probably 600, yet, in view of the fact of hearing the Members of the House who represent those districts and getting from them the number of people crossing, it seemed appalling. We want to correct the defects in the laws, but the question is this: Are we going to help 500 and damage 300,000. The Members from the city of Detroit and the Members of Congress from the northern and southern boundaries can tell the story of their particular districts, and their people are demanding, not asking, demanding this type of legislation from the standpoint of protection of Americans living in their districts. This only deals with skilled and unskilled workers.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time so that I may repeat my question to the chairman of the committee [Mr. DICKSTEIN]. The Labor and State Departments suggested amendments and a substitute measure, which latter did not meet the approval of the committee. May I ask what those amendments were and what the substitute measure was? I am seeking information.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, the State Department in this last bill of the Seventy-fifth Congress did not submit to the chairman of the committee any specific amendment to the Schulte bill now under consideration.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. I appreciate that, but that is begging the question. The gentleman's report says that there was such a substitute amendment offered. Let us know what it is. It is not in the report.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have not that amendment before me because that amendment was not submitted to the committee, and I could not submit something I did not have.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. The gentleman will pardon me, but the chairman of the present Committee on Immigration and Naturalization was the chairman of that committee when the bill was considered before, and it was during his term of office that it was submitted.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. That is true; but the chairman did not receive in this Congress, after a hearing was had on this bill and everybody had due time and notice to be heard any statement from the State Department. The State Department did not appear at the hearing or suggest any particular amendment.

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Then, Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, the chairman has now been asked two vital questions, one by my colleague [Mr. WITHROW], as to the law of Canada and Mexico on the subject, and he has not answered that. The other I have asked, as to what substitute measure was suggested or asked for by the Department of Labor or the Department of State, and he does not furnish us that information; so I say, in all seriousness, before we do something that is ill-considered, let us recommit the bill to the committee and let it call in the Labor Department and the State Department and see what they have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for 1 minute to say to the committee that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK], when his time expired, had started to develop a phase of the situation, respecting the influx of Mexican labor, very much more important than the daily commuting across the border. I am not referring to our native Spanish-Americans, a distinctly different people. I refer to the thousands and thousands of Mexican laborers who drift across the border and infiltrate the entire southwestern section of the United States and furnish both labor and relief problems. This bill does not do anything for that situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman from Wisconsin wanted to know the attitude of the State Department. I am very glad that the gentleman brought that into the argument. I introduced a bill in the Seventy-third Congress excluding Mexicans from coming into continental United States and accepting jobs in our particular districts in the heavy manufacturing sections, and the State Department bitterly opposed that bill in spite of the fact that thousands, yes, millions of Americans, were walking the streets, on the ground that it might hurt our prestige with one of the foreign countries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has again expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said with reference to the fact that the State Department was not called upon to be heard with reference to this bill. I think possibly, as a matter of right, that should have been done. But I am wondering if, after all, it is not a fact that the question as to whether or not we want to enact this measure into a law, is the responsibility of Congress? I believe it is for Congress to decide whether or not this legislation shall be passed or shall be turned down.

One of the big questions involved here is whether or not we are in favor of protecting the American laboring man. Do you want Mexican labor to come across the line into the United States and take the labor of our own American people, who cannot get enough labor to support themselves?

Something has been said on this question about reciprocal agreements. You have just been advised about the situation in Mexico. An American living in the United States cannot go across the line and perform labor in old Mexico without complying with the laws of that country. And yet we permit Mexicans by the thousands to cross the line into the United States every day and perform labor at low wages in competition with American labor, while the American workingmen by the thousands are unable to get work and are on relief.

Something has also been said about being a "good neighbor" to Canada. We want to be a good neighbor to Canada. We have always been good neighbors to Canada; but it seems to me there should be a place where we should be good to the home folks first. If the American people want to go over into Canada and seek labor there, then why not go across the line and become citizens of that country if they want to?

The trouble with this measure is that it does not go quite far enough, but it might help some at least, in helping to protect the American labor market for the American people. With men and women on relief in all of our cities are we going to stand by and permit those people who are willing to work for a less wage to come across the line into our country and compete with the American citizens?

The question involved, as I see it, is this, Do you want aliens to take the jobs of the American citizens? Do you want the American citizens to be deprived of the right to be employed, because of the competition from people who do not even reside within the borders of the United States? We have gone a long way in our so-called reciprocal-trade agreements, but the reciprocity has been against us, it seems to me. We are permitting people from foreign countries and in foreign countries to do our manufacturing and our processing for us. We have even gone so far as to permit them to grow our products and process them for us. We have become importers of products, both raw and processed, from foreign countries, in competition with those that are grown and processed in the United States. We have even gone further, we have permitted the importation of laborers from old Mexico and Canada, who did not even reside within our boundaries.

Now, if we do not pass this measure, we are admitting that we are willing to let foreigners who reside in foreign countries come across the line into the United States and perform our labor for us. Let us help this situation just a little by passing this measure. Let us give the American workingman a chance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES] has expired.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I think it was in the year 1928 Canada bought more goods from this country than any other nation in the world; more than all the rest of the North and South American continents and the West Indies put together. She is again becoming our best customer. To create this unnecessary sales resistance and animosity in the minds of our best customer by legislation of this kind just to retain a couple of thousand jobs here seems to me to be absolutely the worst salesmanship possible on our part. I refuse by my vote to hurl this irritating and needless legislation at our best customer for the sake of a few jobs here, when by so doing we surely will take away from our American workingmen thousands of jobs in producing the materials which Canada buys from us and pays for.

Therefore I am going to vote against this bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER].

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Chairman, I want to acquiesce in the remarks of my colleague from Texas [Mr. THOMASON]. The statement he made regarding the railroads is one of my own experiences. I have been down on the border and into various parts of Mexico, and I find that the minute a train arrives at the gate at the border of Mexico the entire American crew leaves the train, but in coming back to the States no such thing happens. The Mexicans follow that train through to the division point. Some of the labor goes as far as the terminus of the railroad, St. Louis, and other points in the United States.

When the tramways come in from Mexico they circle into the United States in the border cities and carry the same crew on the streetcar into the United States and out again. If the question of reciprocity exists, why not take those men off the car when they arrive at the border cities in the States and let American labor operate the car or train until it goes back into Mexico? Not only that, but no American can go into Mexico and apply for a position or enter into any business unless it is 90 percent or more Mexican. That situation actually exists, and I have experience in that regard to my own satisfaction.

I am for the passage of this bill as it now stands.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KRAMER. I yield.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Is that the law of Mexico, that foreign labor cannot go in there and work?

Mr. KRAMER. An American, what they in Mexico call a foreigner, cannot go there and seek employment. I do not know anything about their laws, but I know that is strictly prohibited for an American laborer to get employment in Mexico.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR of Montana. As a basis for this bill, has the gentleman received any complaint of Canadians coming across the border line between Montana and Canada?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not think I have.

Mr. Chairman, some of my colleagues seem to criticize me and think that I ought to know all the laws of the whole world. One particular complaint that was made was that I should have had the statutes of Mexico, as well as the statutes of all other countries, here, so that if someone should ask me the question, "What is the law in Mexico?" I would have been able to answer it. If I was not in position to answer it, the legislation should be withheld.

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. WITHROW. The reason I asked the gentleman to quote the law or to give us something tangible was because the gentleman himself said there was such a law and referred specifically to that law. I asked the gentleman the question and directed it specifically to that particular law. You based your argument upon it, and still you begged the question. Why does not the gentleman answer the question?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am not begging the question and never have. I never get on my feet on this floor unless I am fortified with knowledge and information. I told the gentleman and I tell this House, and I repeat it, that Quebec has an absolute restrictive law against any American coming in to work, even if it is for only one single hour. They turn them back from the border to their home country. I have told the gentleman and I tell the House now that the same law, or similar statutes, exist in Mexico. I did not know it was the practice of any chairman of any committee to incorporate in the report the respective laws of other countries.

Mr. WITHROW. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WITHROW. How can the gentleman account for so many American citizens working in Canada, then?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. They are not. I will tell the gentleman who is working there.

Mr. WITHROW. The State Department says they are.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will tell the gentleman who is working there. There are a number of technicians whom we have in this country whom Canada does not have. It is only those particular technicians who are permitted to go into Canada to help them run their factories. We, on the other hand, have been on the receiving side for years. I am not quarreling with the gentleman because he is against the bill.

Mr. WITHROW. I am not against the bill; I only want it clarified.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I have no interest in this bill one way or another, but I do not want it to be charged that I am stifling legislation. I do not want my friends in the House to think I am withholding some proper legislation. It is my policy, always, to let a bill come out on the floor, to let it be discussed. I know if it is good, you will vote for it; if it is bad, you will vote against it. You are not hurting my feelings a bit.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. SCHULTE. The gentleman asked a question about the number of people involved. I should like to answer him by quoting statistics from the Department of Labor. Residents of the United States crossing the Canadian border, intermittent—that does not mean day by day—7,159; active—that means the daily commuters—224. Residents of Canada, intermittent, 2,187; active, 3,404—better than 10 or 12 to 1. Residents of Mexico, 52,551 active; commuting, 29,963. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Now, if I may proceed for a moment, the gentleman from Wisconsin—and I have great admiration for him—appears to base his complaint on the fact that the State Department had forwarded to the committee some amendments about 3 years ago. Could I have anticipated 3 years ago that on St. Patrick's Day 1937 the gentleman from Wisconsin was going to ask what the amendments were? The committee disregarded them 3 years ago. Now, what were the amendments? If the gentleman, instead of first criticizing the chairman or the committee, would look at Report No. 159, filed 1934, he would find that we used the language of the amendments that were offered by the State Department 3 years ago. They were just clarifying amendments; they were nothing substantial and did not change the form of the legislation. From the nature of the gentleman's criticism it might appear that I was either ignorant and did not remember the amendments, or that I was stifling or withholding the amendments. Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the amendments? The State Department, through its secretary, Mr. Carr, a fine gentleman, a man whose word I would take at any time, has said that they had no specific recommendations to make to the committee. All the amendments did was to change the numbering of section 3 to make it section 4 and to change the numbering of section 4 to make it section 5. These were the so-called technical, clarifying amendments to which we paid no attention.

Mr. Chairman, the committee, of which I am only one member, unanimously reported this bill. I do not think we had a record vote. The facts have been presented to you. If you think the bill is worth while, vote for it; if not, vote against it.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The language of line 9, page 1, of the bill prohibits so-called aliens from engaging in any employment. Would this section of the bill prohibit the continuation of the custom I am about to outline? In my city, Seattle, is a large fur exchange. Most of the furs come from Alaska and the Puget Sound district. Anywhere from 100 to 200 Canadians, representing London and British Columbia companies, come to Seattle almost weekly to buy in that fur exchange. Would the bill preclude them from coming to Seattle?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I want to assure the gentleman and to assure the House that it will not affect anyone or anybody unless he or she comes to this country to do manual labor; that is, to work every day. It would not apply to lawyers, doctors, or professional people.

Mr. MAGNUSON. The gentleman does not think this section applies?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not think it applies.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER].

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Chairman, there has been some discussion regarding the laws of Mexico by the gentleman from Wisconsin. His interest being so great, I hand him for his benefit a copy of the laws of Mexico. He may read it; I cannot, because I cannot read the Spanish language. [Laughter.]

Mr. SAUTHOFF. May I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin how, if he cannot read it, he knows what they are? [Laughter.]

Mr. KRAMER. Because I spent 10 days in Mexico with various officials and I was satisfied what their law was and was definitely informed that no American could receive employment in Mexico.

Mr. BOILEAU. Have the members of the committee read it?

Mr. KRAMER. The members of the committee are not interested in reading it now; the gentleman from Wisconsin is.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no alien or aliens, foreigner or foreigners, or citizens of any foreign country, nation, or colony, or a citizen of a possession of any foreign nation or country, the boundaries of which touch the boundaries of the United States of America or are contiguous thereto, shall be permitted to habitually cross said international boundary line for the purpose of seeking employment, or engaging in any employment, vocation, or trade, either as skilled or unskilled labor employment, in the United States of America, to and from his or their residence or residences which are outside of the borders of the said continental United States.

SEC. 2. The words "alien", "foreigner", and "citizen of any foreign country, nation, or colony" shall be construed to mean any person who has his residence in said foreign country, nation, or possession or colony of a foreign cuntry.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHULTE: Page 2, line 4, strike out all of section 2.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, the reason I have offered this amendment is to meet the objections of some of the Members who felt the situation is well covered in the first five lines of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Aliens within the purview of sections 1 and 2 of this act shall be held to be immigrants and shall be excluded from the United States, or shall be deported from the United States under the provisions of the immigration laws now in effect, unless they are in possession of an unexpired immigration visa at each separate application for admission or in possesson of an unexpired reentry permit for each separate application to return from foreign contiguous territory.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and request the attention of the gentleman from Indiana. I did not get the full purport of the gentleman's statement a moment ago in connection with striking out section 2.

Mr. SCHULTE. I said that it would probably meet the objections of some of the friends of the gentlemen who find this goes a bit too far.

Mr. BOILEAU. Did I understand the gentleman to say that a similar purpose is already served in section 1?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes; in lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5.

Mr. BOILEAU. As pointed out in general debate on this bill, under the provisions of section 2 an American citizen living either in Canada or Mexico could not under section 2 commute across the international boundary. The gentleman does not infer, does he, that section 1 prohibits that?

Mr. SCHULTE. No; I do not. I offered the amendment striking out section 2 at the request of some of the gentleman's friends who are opposed to section 2.

Mr. BOILEAU. Let us have the opportunity to read this Mexican law that the gentleman from California brought here a few minutes ago. In view of the fact that the only copy of that law seems to be in the Spanish language, I wonder which gentlemen of the committee have read the particular Mexican law they are flaunting before us, which states that American citizens are excluded from working in Mexico. I submit, Mr. Chairman, the whole matter should be threshed out before the committee, and at the proper moment I am going to offer a motion to recommit, which I am hopeful the Members of the House will agree to, sending the bill back to the committee so that the committee may consider this thing fully.

Mr. WITHROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WITHROW. A moment ago I went over to the chairman of the Immigration Committee, and I find he has the Mexican law. He said, "Here it is." He handed it to me, and I found out it was written in the Spanish language. He could not read it. I could not read it. I do not believe the gentleman now knows what the law is.

Mr. BOILEAU. I think if we recommit the bill to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization and have that Mexican law interpreted or translated by someone in the Congressional Library and have it put in the English language, we will know what is being done in Mexico at the present time with reference to American labor.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am partial to this bill. I had prepared an amendment to section 2 that would have excepted citizens of the United States with residence in our neighboring countries. However, since a Member of the committee has offered an amendment striking out the whole section I did not submit my amendment. Since he has stated that he believed in the Senate he can have that section reinserted, which proposition would prevent Americans from living in neighboring countries and working in this country, I want to warn him. If he is a real friend to this bill, and I am friendly to it, I would suggest he better not do that. If he reinserts such provision to prohibit American citizens living some place else commuting casually or otherwise back into their own country for employment, his bill will be held unconstitutional, because the gist of this bill lies in the definition of the word "alien." This bill forbids an alien or citizen of another country from commuting or seeking employment in this country and so soon as his bill is carried to the Supreme Court with a provision denying to an American citizen the right to take up residence in Mexico, Canada, or any place else and come back to his own country for employment, it will be held to be bad law.

If you really want a bill of this kind—to give employment to Americans and prevent Canadians or Mexicans from taking employment away from American citizens—then I plead with you not to insert such a definition of "foreigner" in this bill. Why it is brand new in the history of nations to expatriate an American simply because he takes up residence in Canada or Mexico. There is no precedent in the world for such a definition of citizenship.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I yield.

Mr. SCHULTE. I know the gentleman is fair and wants to be fair, but does the gentleman think it is right and just to the rest of the citizenry of this country that someone, in order to avoid paying his just part of the taxes and upkeep of this country, can move to a contiguous foreign country and continue to accept employment in this country? Certainly the gentleman does not think that is fair.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I will answer by saying that is something no Member of Congress can cover. The Constitution says a citizen of the United States is a person born therein or duly naturalized. It makes no difference if he commutes 10 times a day into Canada. You cannot expatriate him by a dictum in this bill. Therefore I warn the gentleman the whole bill will be bad and he will have no law, assuming he really wants a law to prevent Canadians or Mexicans or anybody else from consuming the employment of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The gentleman from Wisconsin, whether in jest or not, stated I handed him the laws of Mexico. In the first place, I did not hand the gentleman the laws of Mexico, and I did not take the trouble to go get them. It was the gentleman from California who took the trouble to advise the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. WITHROW. I will thank the gentleman.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The statement made by the chairman and the committee dealing with labor still holds, whether or not the gentleman has it translated by the congressional librarian, and I hope he does.

I want to assure the Members of this House there is no intention on the part of the committee to go to the Senate and ask that body to do anything different from what the House may do. Insofar as this committee is concerned, we have completed our job when the House passes on this bill and any amendments it desires to accept. I do not want any charge of retaliation made against the committee. It is not the intention of the committee to change any language in this bill, once it passes the House.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. May I ask if there were any hearings on this particular bill?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. KLEBERG. Were the hearings ever printed?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; not this year. They were printed about 3 years ago.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is evident to me from the large number in attendance here this afternoon, as well as the attention the Members are giving to the debate, that the majority of this Congress would like to see the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization bring a bill before the House that would require the Secretary of Labor and her subordinates to deport every alien who is now in this country unlawfully. There were a few of us who were greatly interested in this matter during the last session of Congress and who tried hard to get some real legislation on this subject brought out on the floor of the House for debate. We tried to get the chairman to have hearings on the bill introduced by Mr. DIES, but failed in our efforts. We did have hearings on a similar bill introduced by a member of the committee, Mr. STARNES, which would have deported the aliens who are now in this country unlawfully, but those of us who favored this legislation could not get enough votes in the committee to bring it out for consideration. I agree with the statement made a few moments ago by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] that we, as Members of Congress, should protect our American labor by deporting foreigners and save the jobs in America for American people, but the bill under consideration is limited in its scope. The bill merely protects a few American laborers on the borders of Canada and Mexico and does not touch the real situation prevailing in this country today. Practically every Member of Congress knows that there are thousands upon thousands of aliens in this country at this very moment, who came into this country unlawfully, and who are today holding jobs that rightfully belong to the American people, and the Department of Labor is making no effort whatever to deport them. Since we cannot get the immigration and naturalization officials in the Department of Labor to do their duty under our present laws, the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization should bring a bill before the House providing that it shall be unlawful for any employer of labor to employ an alien. I have no doubt but what this Congress would pass it promptly. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely believe that it would be better to send this bill back to the committee so they can bring a bill to us broad enough to cover the whole United States. If we pass the bill in its present form, it would be difficult to get an amendment passed that will properly protect the American laborer throughout the entire United States. I shall gladly support the bill in its present form if it is not recommitted, but I think it far better to cover the whole United States rather than a few sections on the border.

Mr. Chairman, I was amazed and greatly disappointed at the attitude of our deportation officials which came to my attention at the last session of Congress. They admitted before the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization that there were several thousand aliens in this country that had no legal right to be here. They further admitted before the committee that they were making no effort whatever to get them out of this country; and this admission, Mr. Chairman, in the very face of the law requiring their action in deporting them. I am confident, therefore, that we cannot hope to expect the deportation of many aliens under the present personnel of the Department of Labor unless their attitude should greatly change, and that about the best we can hope for is legislation prohibiting the employment of aliens in this country. I appeal to every Member of Congress to give this matter careful thought so that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, as well as the Department of Labor, may know of our sympathetic attitude toward legislation that will protect and preserve the jobs in America for American citizens, as well as action in deporting foreigners who are in this country unlawfully. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

AMERICAN JOBS FOR AMERICAN WORKINGMEN

Mr. Chairman, it is sometimes intimated that we of the State of Maine are 100 percent conscientious objectors to whatever you ladies and gentlemen upon the right of the aisle may propose. It seems to me that here, as a citizen of a border State thrust up like an elbow into Canada, with hundreds of people marching across that border each morning and marching back each night with American wages in their pockets which they elect to spend in Canada because they can live more cheaply upon that side, it is high time that we at least give consideration to this topic.

To what extent this bill may go in remedying the situation, apparently, remains to be determined, but I, as a Representative of a border district, welcome this attempt, and I believe it is high time that America should begin to take account of its own.

I blush to confess that we are getting along so much better up in the State of Maine than we were. [Laughter and applause.] Perhaps this is a reward of virtue. Perhaps this is a tribute to the efficacy of the surviving measures of the past 4 years which seem to be now considered as inadequate by those who are in authority. They seem now to desire some much more radical proposals to be enacted.

At any rate we are getting along pretty well up in Maine with all our crops. I have pestered you during the last couple of years with potatoes, and potatoes are now doing pretty well, and lumber also. But we certainly have not yet reached the spot where we can safely abandon the protection of American laborers who are willing to live in America in favor of those who desire to march across that imaginary international line.

To be sure, this might not seem to be a "good-neighbor" policy, but as we learned good neighborliness up in the State of Maine, it is necessary, first, to look out for ourselves before we can dispense too much charity to the rest of the world. This is the way we were taught as the proper way to get along, and if this bill looks in that direction, as I understand to be the purpose of the bill, I welcome the action of this committee and I am very happy to give it my support. American jobs for American workingmen is a good motto in a time like this. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I not only endorse what the gentleman from Maine has just said but I would like to make this further observation. I have observed, and it has been my experience in days gone by, that if I had a hard lawsuit I resorted to dilatory tactics, and now, when an absolutely clean-cut proposition is presented to this House, as to whether or not you want an alien to take the job of an American citizen, the first thing we hear is ridicule and even abuse of the chairman and members of the committee, and then pretend to take seriously a remark made in jest by the gentleman from Indiana. The next proposal is to send the bill back to the committee for further consideration. Then my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. FORD] says:

Oh, this program is not big enough; why do we not tackle this in a big way and deport the thousands of aliens in this country who have no right to be in this country?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. I yield.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I will support the present bill.

Mr. THOMASON of Texas. That is fine. We are making progress. Well, let us take a step in the right direction and pass this bill, as the gentleman from Maine said. [Applause.]

There are some of us, like the gentleman from Maine and myself, who have personal knowledge of the literally hundreds of jobs that have been taken that belong to American citizens, placed in the hands of alien citizens, when right in that very town there were long relief lines, and right here in the Halls of Congress every Member of Congress was voting some money, at least, and in many instances, very large sums of money, for relief. Now, if you want to stop this, let us make the start now. The lines are going to be drawn. I say you can read this bill carefully and there is but one thing in this world in it.

There is but one issue in it, and that is whether a man in Canada or a man in Mexico can cross the line every day and take a job that belongs to an American. These poor aliens are glad to get work at any price, and you know there are many profiteers who want cheap labor and take advantage of the situation. There are many unemployed in my town. Many of them are of Mexican descent. I want them to have the preference.

So the issue is whether or not you endorse the principle, as a friend of labor in this country, that these men can come here and take the jobs of American citizens, whether they be native or naturalized.

When you talk about recommitting the bill, that is the issue before you. Why not let this bill be passed? If another body wants to take a different view of it, let it go to conference; but, for Heaven's sake, do not criticize this committee in one breath and then say that we have not got a big enough program, when you have something concrete right here. All I have to say is that the man who is the friend of the American laboring man has but one thing to decide, and that is, Shall they have jobs in this country or shall the poor peons of Mexico take these jobs away from them simply because they are willing to work for a mere pittance? This is the only issue that is involved. The bill ought not to be recommitted. It ought to have a chance to live, and I beg of you to support the bill and later amend it, or let it go to conference, if need be; but there is no rhyme, reason, or excuse for defeating the bill by subterfuge or because you may not like the chairman or the committee.

We talk long and loud about relief and vote millions of dollars for the cause. The average American does not want charity. All he wants is a job. But you do not encourage him when you give a job to which he is entitled to an alien who is willing to work for anything he can get. This practice ought to be stopped, and we now have an opportunity to work out legislation that will first protect our own people and yet maintain friendly relations with the people of Mexico and Canada.

I hold no brief for the Immigration Committee; but they have brought in a bill with only one boiled-down issue, and that is whether or not we will first take care of our own people. If there are jobs left after that is done, then we will be charitable, as usual, and try to take care of others. I confidently believe the bill will pass. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words. When the first section was being read I was called outside the Chamber. I meant to offer an amendment to correct an error in grammar. I think the bill is bad enough without split infinitives, and I ask unanimous consent to return to section 1 to lift the word "habitually", line 8, page 1, from the middle of an infinitive where it now rests, and move it four or five words to the right, so that it will appear after the word "line", in line 8, page 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to section 1 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHULTE. I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The provisions of this act are in addition to the provisions of the immigration laws now in force, and shall be enforced as a part of such laws, and all of the penal or other provisions of such laws now applicable shall apply to and be enforced in connection with the provisions of this act.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think my good friend from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] did not understand my remarks or my intentions on this matter. My only hope in saying that it might be better to recommit the bill was that the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization might take the bill back to their committee and embrace and enlarge upon the subject that we would not only protect the American laborers on the border of Mexico and on the border of Canada, but throughout the entire United States. That is my only thought in this matter. I am for the bill in its present form if we can do no better, but if this law is passed as it now stands, I fear that there will not be another single thing come out of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization regarding this particular subject.

The only object I had was in directing the attention of the House and the Committee to the all-important fact that we should broaden and enlarge upon the bill under consideration to the extent that we would not only protect the American laborers on the borders of Canada and the United States and on the borders of Mexico and the United States, but all over the United States.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield in order that I may ask the author of the bill a question?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to know what effect this would have on an organization that imports Mexican labor for railroads over a given period of time, not daily, but probably for 3, 6, or 9 months a year, under bond, after the expiration of that time, to return them to Mexico.

Mr. SCHULTE. This would stop that entirely.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. ANDRESEN of Minnesota. What is the practice in other countries so far as giving employment to Americans and other foreign citizens is concerned? As I understand it, they are required to register and they are denied employment virtually in every other country in the world.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. I think that is true, and, further, if the gentleman will examine the statistics in this country, he will not only find that these aliens are depriving American citizens of employment but that a large part of the crime committed here is committed by foreigners who came into this country unlawfully and whom the Department of Labor officials are refusing to deport from this country. There is no question but what every alien should be required to register when he comes into this country, and he should also be fingerprinted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. The provisions of this act shall not be applicable to any person who is a bona-fide employee of any common carrier operating between the United States and any foreign contiguous territory.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LANHAM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 3679, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLARD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and nine Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 31]

Bigelow	Drew, Pa.	Imhoff	Richards
Boren	Duncan	Jenks, N. H.	Rigney
Boykin	Farley	Keller	Robinson, Utah
Bradley	Fish	Kelly, N. Y.	Ryan
Buckley, N. Y.	Forand	Kloeb	Schaefer, Ill.
Burdick	Fulmer	Lamneck	Scrugham
Cannon, Wis.	Gasque	Lanzetta	Shanley
Casey, Mass.	Gilchrist	Lewis, Md.	Sheppard
Clark, Idaho	Goodwin	Long	Smith, Va.
Coffee, Nebr.	Greever	McCormack	Smith, Wash.
Connery	Griffith	McGehee	Somers, N. Y.
Cravens	Havenner	McGranery	Sullivan

DeRouen	Hoffman	May	Wene
Dixon	Honeyman	Mouton	White, Idaho
Dondero	Hook	O'Brien, Mich.	Wood
Dorsey	Hope	O'Neal, Ky.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and forty-nine Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I stated to several Members on the floor that I intended to offer a motion to recommit this bill. I have decided not to offer that motion. I make this statement so that those with whom I have conferred will not think it was a matter of bad faith; and if anyone desires to offer such a motion to recommit, they may do so themselves. I have decided not to do so.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY STAY OF CERTAIN ALIENS IN THE UNITED STATES AND DEPORTATION OF CERTAIN ALIENS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, I call up the bill (H. R. 27) to authorize the shortening or termination of temporary stay in the United States of certain aliens not admitted for permanent residence, to authorize the deportation of certain aliens admitted for permanent residence, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 27, with Mr. MARTIN of Colorado in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, when this bill appeared on the Consent Calendar there was only one objection. I submit to the House that the bill ought to be enacted without any objection.

This bill attempts to deport aliens who come to this country as temporary visitors, but who, in truth and in fact, are spreading subversive propaganda in the United States.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. If that be so, why, in section 2, does the following language appear?—

• • • propaganda instigated from foreign sources.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Well, they are.

Mr. COCHRAN. What is the difference where it comes from? No matter where it comes from, whether a foreign source or otherwise, if they are distributing unlawful propaganda, even if it is written in this country, why not get rid of them?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Some citizens may be doing it, too, but we have no control over them. This committee only has control when it deals with aliens.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman is dealing with aliens, but he does not confine it to unlawful propaganda without saying where it comes from. The gentleman is limiting this only to propaganda that comes from foreign countries. Why should the gentleman do that?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I answer the gentleman from Missouri by saying that the Committee on Immigration deals only with aliens. If citizens of the United States spread propaganda that comes into this country from foreign sources, there is no way we can deal with them. We are dealing only with aliens who come here under the guise of visitors or on business.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman, however, is dealing with aliens in this section, too. So am I. I say that we should not deport only the alien spreading unlawful propaganda which comes from a foreign country, but we should deport him if he draws up the propaganda himself in this country. The gentleman's committee would have jurisdiction to leave that language out.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I will come to that, and I will look at the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in the last 3 or 4 years, aliens entering the United States as visitors are permitted to stay in this country a definite period of time—3 months, 6 months, or a year—and there is no way in which we can terminate the temporary stay of these aliens who come here for the sole purpose of spreading propaganda against our Government and against the best interests of this country.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. As I understand it, this is the bill, H. R. 27, relating to the exclusion of aliens who spread in this country propaganda from foreign sources. Am I correct?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. MAVERICK. I would ask the gentleman a question based on this statement of facts: Let us assume someone persecuted by Hitler comes here from Germany and criticizes Mr. Hitler very severely. I presume that at this meeting the other night where Mr. Johnson and Mr. LaGuardia were there must have been several thousand foreigners. Suppose someone comes over here and criticizes Mr. Hitler, or suppose a Catholic priest comes here and criticizes the Mexican Government for persecution of the Catholics, would it not be in line to deport the person of any racial background to Germany, where he would get his head cut off, or the priest to Mexico, where he would be shot, for they still shoot people in Mexico? This thing works both ways. Does not the gentleman think we might be establishing a dangerous precedent and that we would get into trouble the very people we want to protect and help out?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I think the gentleman from Texas has an entirely different conception of this bill than the committee has. The bill is not intended at all to apply to the situations assumed by the gentleman's question.

Mr. MAVERICK. No; I understand perfectly. For, indeed, it will apply to the situations I have named.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I am trying to convey to the gentleman and to the House the thought that under present law our hands are tied. People, call them spies if you like, come here ostensibly for business purposes—their visas are obtained for business purposes—yet in fact they come here temporarily with the sole intention of spreading propaganda, whether it is from Mexico or some other place, which, in the opinion of the committee and the country, is inimical to our form of government. Now, we cannot tell him to go back to his native country until his time expires. All we ask is that when we find a foreign national has come here for the sole purpose of spreading subversive propaganda in this country that we can tell this man or woman to get out.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 3 additional minutes.

The pending bill has no application to freedom of speech or press. It simply boils down to the one proposition I have outlined. About 6,000 people have come into this country with the sole intention of spreading hatred and bigotry among our American citizens. At the present time under the present immigration laws we cannot send these people back immediately. We find out what they are doing, but must wait until their time expires.

No American can go into any foreign country and say "boo" about the form of government without being told to get out the next day. On the other hand, as the law stands today, if the gentleman from Texas came, we will say from Italy, or from England, with the sole purpose of trying to cement public opinion against our people and our form of government, and the gentleman had received permission to stay here 6 months, we could not send him home until the 6 months were up. What is wrong with the purpose of the bill?

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I yield.

Mr. MAVERICK. In the city of San Antonio at one time were a large number of Catholic priests who had been deported from Mexico. They denounced the Government of Mexico as communistic, and denounced the President of Mexico. They were foreigners in the city of San Antonio. Under the provisions of the pending bill, whether or not that action of these priests was their sole purpose, their leave would have to be terminated; and if it had been terminated and they were sent back to Mexico, they would have been shot. This thing works both ways, it must be remembered.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. We have given this matter very serious thought.

Mr. MAVERICK. Could not these Catholic priests be put out of the country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; not under the state of facts the gentleman presents.

The gentleman is placing an entirely different construction upon this bill.

Mr. MAVERICK. Show me where that cannot be. It would apply to all, all races and religions included. Any way you take it, it is very bad.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. If a man comes in here temporarily and his country did not chase him out, he is not a refugee. He did not come here for any other purpose than to distribute attacks upon the American citizenship. That is in his mind all the time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman a member of the committee.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. No.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. In its present form I think I am.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I take this time so that the House might know what this bill is about. Those of you who have been in Congress for any length of time know it is a mighty easy matter to get up a fight on an immigration bill. It is not my purpose to encourage a fight on this bill but rather to take the time so that the Members may know about the bill. This is a very important bill. We have had it before us several times and in previous sessions of Congress. It was passed in the last Congress by the House, but failed of consideration in the Senate. We made some very essential amendments to it in its devious course at that time. Whether you want this bill or not, of course, is up to the Members, and I think you should give the matter your attention, because practically all of you have taken positions in times gone by on this important question that we call immigration. Some have declared themselves as being restrictionists, and others have taken other positions.

This is a bill that might worry some. On the other hand, some of you might think it is trivial, and I should not take the time of the House to discuss it, and I am not going to do so very long.

Here is what the bill says:

That under general authority granted by the act of July 1, 1932, the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, shall by regulation provide for the shortening or the termination of the lawful stay in the United States of every alien admitted for permanent residence who while in the United States engages in the promotion or dissemination of propaganda instigated from foreign sources, or who while in the United States engages in unlawful political activity.

There are two groups dealt with here. One group includes people who disseminate or promote the dissemination of propaganda instigated from foreign sources.

I think that the first bill introduced, and which we considered in the Seventy-fourth Congress, provided language that would apply to anybody who disseminated propaganda that was subversive to the United States. We amended that bill by adding these words "instigated from foreign sources."

That language will modify and localize the action or offense and render the bill innocuous as far as it applies to propaganda which emanates from local sources. The bill was then restricted to propaganda from foreign sources.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is primarily directed against one group of people; that is, people who come to this country from foreign countries to peddle propaganda instigated and hatched in foreign countries. It is the purpose of this bill to reach them.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Why not make this bill provide that anyone convicted of violating the laws of the United States shall be deported? Why turn this power over to somebody down here in a bureau to interfere with every visitor who comes to the United States because, forsooth, somebody makes a charge against them that they have attempted to spread propaganda? Propaganda is a far-reaching expression. We hear it every day. We see it in every newspaper. It seems to me that this bill goes further than we would be justified in going in a measure of this kind. It should be limited. If a bill of this sort is passed, it seems to me it ought to be limited to those who may be convicted of violating the laws of the United States or any State.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman has asked an important question and one that is entirely apropos, but I shall not answer the gentleman at this time, for I would like to have the gentleman take some time of his own to go into and to explain that proposition.

Mr. RANKIN. Does the gentleman agree with me?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; the gentleman is, I know, much interested in immigration, and I should like for him to develop his ideas. It was because I wanted the membership to consider this matter and express their views that I brought the matter up.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield to the genial gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. I am in sympathy with the purpose of the measure, because I think we have imported into this country many of the troubles which have afflicted us. The bill, however, does not seem to be very clear, following up somewhat the suggestion made by the gentleman from Mississippi, as to who shall pass on whether or not this propaganda is insidious and directed from foreign sources, whether or not it is inimical to our country and whether or not the political practices of these aliens temporarily in the country are hostile to our form of government.

The purpose of the bill, it seems, is absolutely pure and unassailable, but the question in my mind is who is going to pass upon that matter? It says in here, "By regulation prescribed by the Department of Labor" they may be deported. But who determines that regulation?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is the question, and it is a very important one. And I thank the distinguished gentleman for raising it. Inasmuch as the gentleman has raised it, I will take just a minute to elucidate it. I also invite the gentleman to take some time to give the House his views.

It involves one of these propositions many of us have been more or less opposed to here, namely, the surrender of power to the Secretary of Labor. I have vigorously opposed this myself. At the same time, I sympathize with the proponents of this bill in the respect that you cannot very well reach these people if you have to wait until these people have been arrested and gone through the formalities of prosecution and conviction, because it is going to be a pretty difficult thing to prosecute anybody for scattering propaganda, unless it is of a libelous nature. We do not have criminal statutes that touch propaganda that I know of. The whole thing is rather cumbersome from that standpoint. As I have heretofore stated, that was my purpose in opening up this subject.

Mr. LANHAM. The bill simply says that regulations shall be prescribed by the Secretary of Labor or the Commissioner, but who passes upon whether or not the particular circumstance involves a violation?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The Secretary of Labor does. If she does not or he does not, nobody does, because that is the only provision in the bill in reference to it.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. If this measure became law would it prohibit the agents of any foreign country coming over here and distributing propaganda for the purpose of securing loans for war purposes?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The gentleman asks a question I cannot answer definitely. His question is like many other important questions that might be asked about this bill. I may say that if the gentleman will read section 3, it is supposed to explain exactly what it means. Whether it does or whether it would cover the gentleman's question I do not know. If I were to make an offhand guess I would say that it is not the intention of the authors of the bill to include the item because that would not be subversive. But of course, if they would carry it to the extent that it would incite a war or rebellion in our own country, then naturally it would come within the language of the section.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. The facts are that propaganda like that has been carried on——

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes.

Mr. LUCKEY of Nebraska. Which did lead to the making of loans for war purposes.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes. I suggest the gentleman might direct his questions to one of the proponents of the bill a little later when one of them has the floor. He has a good idea that he should develop, and I hope he gets some time to do so. I shall be glad to allow the gentleman some time later.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. According to section 3 of this bill, if an alien talks about principles that are subversive of the Constitution, he could be deported for favoring such legislation as the A. A. A. and other acts sponsored by the New Deal which have been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. The provision is a little bit broad. You could chase any foreigner out for advocating the A. A. A. under the wording of section 3.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I think not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The statement as to propaganda is very general. Will the gentleman state a specific case of the type of propaganda to which this applies?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. If the gentleman will read section 3, it is explanatory of the very thing about which the gentleman has asked me, and there are two categories there that seek to explain that point. Whether they do or not, I suggest the gentleman read that section carefully, and I think he will be able to determine whether the language answers his question. The gentleman's question is a very intelligent one, and the fact that a ready answer cannot be easily given to it is because the whole structure of the bill is not in clear, unequivocal language.

Mr. FLETCHER. I may say to the gentleman I did read it, but I thought the gentleman might suggest a specific case of propaganda such as he has in mind which has occurred recently in this country.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have none. I am not appearing as a proponent of the bill. Perhaps the gentleman did not hear my opening remarks. I am just throwing the matter open for discussion, because this is a very important measure, and I want the gentleman of Ohio and other interested gentlemen to have a chance to express their views.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I gladly yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Would the gentleman think it advisable if a board of three, composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Labor, and the Attorney General, should be appointed to determine whether such deportations were proper?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; I think it would be a great adjunct to the bill.

The first section provides for the shortening or the termination of the lawful stay in the United States of any alien coming into this country who engaged in the promotion or dissemination of propaganda instigated from foreign sources as one category. The second category is "or who while in the United States engages in unlawful political activities."

"Engages in unlawful political activities" is a very broad classification. When the bill was up for consideration previously, I think, at my suggestion, or at the suggestion of some of us who tried to perfect the bill, language was placed in the bill, appearing on page 3, stating that "'unlawful political activities instigated from foreign sources' when used in this act shall only mean"—what?

> Any activities, identified with official policies of any foreign governmental agency or political party, which are directed or supported from a headquarters located in territory outside the jurisdiction of the United States and which seeks to influence political action and thought within the United States—

And there are two categories enumerated further down in the bill.

We tried to restrict the language so that it applied only to those intended to be reached. We tried to make it as clear-cut and definite as we could to meet the theory of its proponents on this theory. There is no doubt there are a lot of people here engaged in scattering unlawful propaganda in this country who ought to be deported. There is no question about that. However, we have no State laws that I know of—at least, as far as I know, we have none in Ohio—which deal with the man who scatters propaganda against the Government unless the offense rises to the enormity of treason. I suppose we could reach him in that way, but all such actions are usually reached by the Federal authorities.

We are dealing with a new crime, making it unlawful to engage in scattering propaganda and providing the punishment of deportation.

In this country everybody is engaged more or less in politics, everybody, at least, who amounts to anything. [Laughter.] Everyone who has the welfare of the country at heart is engaged somewhat in politics. Now, what kind of politics? Sometimes, if one listens to the speeches on the floor of the House, the way one Member recriminates another, one might think we would all be deportable, under that interpretation of the bill. However, in justice to this bill, I may say it is not intended to mean this. I understand it is intended to meet these agitators from foreign countries who would overthrow the Government of our country if this would serve their purposes.

As heretofore stated, "political activities" is broad and may have potentialities that we should search out carefully. Surely it cannot be so far-reaching as to permit an overzealous political worker to hold a club over honorable aliens living in the United States pending their naturalization should they seek to take an interest in public questions and hold and express views not in agreement with those of the political worker. I know it is not the intention of the proponents of the bill that it should be used to bring about such a result.

The whole question is, Are we not going too far in trying to do something that no doubt should be done? Would it not be better if the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization would take this bill up again and bring out a bill that they can defend vigorously and explain readily. There is here the nucleus of an effective statute. To be effective, however, it must seek to do something definite and should do it in clear, definite language. [Applause.]

I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I believe where men are guilty of these practices we should make their stay just as brief as possible and deport them. But let me ask this question—because it seems to me the bill might need some amendment in this regard, which would not prolong unduly the consideration of the individual cases pending against this measure—in each of these sections one of the things upon which whoever has control will be called to pass is whether or not the unlawful political activities or the unlawful propaganda are subversive of the Constitution of the United States, leaving it to either the Secretary of Labor or the Commissioner of Immigration and Naturalization to pass upon whether the agitation was subversive of the Constitution of the United States. In order that justice might be done in all cases, and the aliens might be deported as quickly as possible if they were offenders, and in order that injustice might not be done in a case where the aliens were really not offenders, should there not be a provision that the matter should be passed upon not only by the Secretary of Labor but by the Attorney General or someone from the Department of Justice, or possibly from the State Department; and that such a Board, especially since the offense involves the Constitution, should have someone in a legal capacity representing the Government in order that there might be no quibbling and that the final determination as to deportation should be correct?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that the gentlewoman from Massachusetts suggested that awhile ago—and I agree with her suggestion—that this Board might be constituted of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Labor, and the Attorney General, which would give us representation from the Department of Justice.

Mr. LANHAM. I did not hear the suggestion, but it seems to me where matters are going to be passed upon which involve the Constitution and whether or not propaganda and unlawful political activities would be subversive of the Constitution, certainly someone serving the Government in a legal capacity should be present to put a proper legal construction upon such questions; but the Board should act with such dispatch that these undesirable aliens who are preaching this harmful propaganda or indulging in these unlawful political activities might not be allowed thereby to extend their stay in this country.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Ohio will permit, I agree we ought to safeguard it, but, of course, in this country we allow freedom of action, freedom of speech, and freedom of thought and we must be sure we live up to that.

Mr. LANHAM. Does the gentlewoman from Massachusetts contemplate introducing such an amendment?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I would be pleased to have the gentleman introduce it. I do not care myself who introduces the amendment.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. KLEBERG. While my colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] has the floor, may I offer the suggestion at this particular point that the United States is divided into various judicial districts. Why not submit these cases as they come up, inasmuch as many immigration cases come before the various district judges, to that court and have the district judge, who is thoroughly qualified to pass on such questions, render the decision in such cases?

Mr. LANHAM. If they could be passed upon with dispatch in that way, of course, I would have no objection. I think the undesirable aliens preaching propaganda hostile to our country and the principles upon which it is founded, should be got out of the country as rapidly as possible, and I would not do anything that would interfere with the dispatch of such deportations. However, I would want, in justice to those who might be falsely accused through pique or personal antipathy, or whatever it might be, to be sure that the final adjudication of the matter was upon a fair and impartial basis.

Mr. KLEBERG. For that reason I suggest to my friend that this matter be handled at any of the most immediate sessions of the court in any of the districts where the violation of this law, if it should be enacted, took place; and in that event, the court being in session almost the year around, we would have almost immediate action by competent authority.

Mr. LANHAM. I thank my friend, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], for the privilege of this colloquy.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask in my own time now whether the chairman of the committee will accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Texas and the gentlewoman from Massachusetts, to add the Secretary of State and the Attorney General?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I do not see any objection to that. My sole purpose is to call the attention of the House to this continuous form of pernicious propaganda attacking our Government. I am not interested if they come here and talk about another government. What I am trying to prevent is having these aliens who are here temporarily attack our Government.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Very well; if the gentlewoman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Texas will get together and prepare such an amendment, we can carry out the agreement.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Texas. I will not be responsible for what he may say, however. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio said he would not be responsible for anything I said.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I withdraw that remark from the RECORD.

Mr. MAVERICK. Oh, it was said in good humor, and I take it in good humor. I thank my distinguished Republican colleague for the time. We are all good friends.

I may say to the Republican side of the House and the Democratic side of the House that this is something I believe the most conservative man on earth and the most radical man on earth can agree on. That is because this simply means we put in the hands of the Department of Labor the Constitution, the courts, and the entire United States Government.

This is one of the most eccentric bills I ever heard of in my entire life. This bill that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] puts up, quite conscientiously, is submitted for the purpose of putting the Nazis and the Communists out of the country, I am told.

But what does it do at the very same time? It means that a man of other than so-called "pure Aryan blood" who comes to this country and denounces the Fascist Government will be sent back to Germany to have his head cut off by Hitler. An opponent of communism from Russia would be sent back, and so on. Now, that is what it actually means. Of course, the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] says he does not mean that, and he does not, of course, intend that; but it does mean just that.

O, Mr. Chairman, this bill means that when the Boy Scouts come here from foreign countries they cannot even say a word about the doctrines of the Boy Scouts. It means that Einstein cannot come over here and talk about the fourth dimension, whatever that is. It means they cannot come here and "spread propaganda" about the World's Fair. It means they cannot come over here and talk about peace. And it further means that if a priest or preacher wanted to come over here, he could not come over here and talk about the Christian religion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, you may think this sounds a little ridiculous, but it is not ridiculous. In my own home town of San Antonio, Tex., a number of priests were deported out of Mexico, others came by regular passports to that city. They denounced the Government of Mexico. They said there was a Communist government in Mexico. I believe they should have that right. But if we pass this bill, we gentlemen will consign the Constitution, the laws of this country right into the hands of the Department of Labor. By this legislation we would deprive such a person of a chance to come before the courts. We suspend the Bill of Rights and the Constitution, because a man happens to be a foreigner, and we say, "Send that priest back to Mexico, where he will be shot", or "Send this young fellow, who is not 'pure Aryan', back to Germany, where he will have his head cut off." This is what we are doing, gentlemen, and it is a bad bill.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield.

Mr. REILLY. Can the gentleman point to anything in this bill that provides that such a person will be deported because they talk about a foreign government?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes! Yes! The bill says:

The extension from any foreign country to United States of the application of any religious or racial prejudices and intolerances—

And God knows what that means, except it may mean anything, according to the Labor Department, who will have the sole power to judge—then—in official and private life.

One cannot even talk in "private life" or in "business affairs." That is what the bill says. He cannot in private or business life say what he thinks about any subject whatever.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman is fair, and I do not want the heat of passion brought up simply because of Jews or Catholics or priests from some other country. I want the facts. The facts are not what the gentleman has read. The Mexican priests that he is talking about, if they talked about conditions in Mexico, would not come under the provisions of this bill at all. They can talk about Mexico all they want; but I am trying to have enacted into law a provision whereby aliens who come here for a short period for the sole purpose of attacking our Government may be deported.

Mr. MAVERICK. But the bill does not say that. This is the most slipshod bill I ever saw. It says:

Extension from any foreign country to United States of the application of any religious—

And that means Protestant, Catholic, Mohammedan, Jewish, Buddhist, or any other religion—or racial prejudices—

And that is Mexican, German, Jewish, Bohemian, Belgian, anything—and intolerances—

And there are a million of them—in official and private life and in business affairs.

A man could not come into my home or in my business house and say a word.

What a nightmare of legislation!

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. MAVERICK. Ask me.

Mr. DIES. I am like the gentleman in these two particulars but I cannot understand it. What I want the gentleman to do is to have the Chairman explain what is meant by—

Extension from any foreign country to United States of the application of any religious or racial prejudice and intolerances in official and private life and in business affairs.

Mr. MAVERICK. Will the gentleman from New York kindly answer that question?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, in the last 2 or 3 years we have had vicious documents brought in from foreign sources by certain aliens who come here for a temporary stay, and it brings up attacks in respect to the racial conditions of the people of this country.

Mr. MAVERICK. I have answered that already. But who is to decide what is vicious? Racial? A law like this is a double-edged sword, cutting mercilessly both ways. It cuts the oppressed, do not forget that.

Mr. DIES. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas so that he may ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] a question.

Mr. DIES. Does not the gentleman think his language is entirely too broad and capable of misinterpretation? It seems to me that under this subsection (2) the gentleman from Texas is entirely right, not in reference to the other provisions in the bill, but in reference to this subsection (2).

Mr. DICKSTEIN. I think that may be stricken out.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman agree to strike that out?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. It is not my intention to turn around and stir up passions. There is only one purpose in my mind and I think I have made that plain.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. DICKSTEIN says that he is willing to strike out a certain portion. We have already shown five or six defects in this bill. This bill and every word of it ought to be defeated.

It is the most slipshod piece of legislation that I have ever seen.

We are doing the very thing the Republicans always object to. They are always objecting to putting into the hands of the bureaus and boards all kinds of power. That is exactly what we are doing. But this is much worse. We are unloading the Constitution and the laws of the country on the Labor Department. Here we abandon our duty. We pave the way for spies, tyrannies, blackmailers—oh, it is just not government at all. This is one of the worst bills I ever saw in all my life.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. I agree with what the gentleman said. Let us now turn to the very last line on page 3, where the bill goes on to say—

Tends to foment political acrimony and business animosity in the United States.

I have never seen anything in my life where the sky came nearer to being the limit, than in this legislative monstrosity. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The gentleman is ordinarily an intelligent Congressman; but he does not get the theory of this bill. The theory of the bill is that if you are bothered with bedbugs, then burn the whole house down.

Mr. MAVERICK. I thank the gentleman for the first part of his brilliant remark about my being ordinarily an intelligent Congressman. An honor! an honor!

The distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON] is right. He shows the idea of this bill is that if you have a few bedbugs you should burn the house down. He might have said, and burn up all the people and what laws they have also. This bill was jumped up like the devil, and I never got to read it all through. I happened to just walk in here and I read the first part, but I agree with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. Listen to what Mr. RANKIN pointed out:

Tends to foment political acrimony and business animosity in the United States.

If a man happened to say to a Republican that the Manufacturers' League was not any good, that man could be deported, and if anything was said over here about our view of the Supreme Court, we deport such a man. That is what the bill says. This bill will absolutely violate every precedent that America ever knew. It is unfair, it is nonsensical, it is brutal. This is actually the worst bill that was ever introduced in any legislative body in the whole world. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. Yes.

Mr. SCOTT. I wonder if this bill would have any effect on Congressmen from Maine and Vermont.

Mr. MAVERICK. The gentleman wants to know about Maine and Vermont. I imagine that they could talk; I believe Vermont and Maine are in the United States.

Mr. TEIGAN. Suppose a visitor from Sweden should come over here and be invited to tell us something about the social democratic government of that country, what would happen to him?

Mr. MAVERICK. This is what could happen. I do not know what would happen to him, but the Department of Labor would be the sole judge of the Constitution and the laws. The courts would not have any say and would not be in it, and they could send the man out of the country for attempting to say anything.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I will tell the gentleman from Minnesota what could be done. If a man from Sweden were to come to this country and attempted to explain to American citizens that in that country they have a power system that is publicly owned, that furnishes people power at reasonable rates, the Power Trust, if they had sufficient influence, could have him deported under this bill if it tended to arouse "business animosity", which it undoubtedly would.

Mr. MAVERICK. And if an officer would come here——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MAVERICK. If an officer would come here from Germany and explain the military system of Germany to a group of our young officers, he could be deported as an undesirable alien.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. MAVERICK. The gentleman just yielded me 2 additional minutes.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from New York yielded himself 2 minutes so that he could make a statement.

Mr. MAVERICK. But the gentleman yielded me 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MAVERICK. I want to say something with which I think everybody in this House, even the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN] will agree. The gentleman from New York is fair and will be fair. I am of the opinion, and I think any man on this floor is of the opinion, that if you can use this against a gentile you can use it against a Jew. If you can use it against a Protestant, you can use it against a Catholic. If you can use it against a blue-eyed Nordic blond, you can use it against an Arab.

This bill is bad.

I suggest that the bill be recommitted, and that we agree that it go back and have whatever is wrong about it taken out, and bring it back to this floor, if a good bill can be made of it, which I think is impossible. I make that suggestion to the chairman of the committee now.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman that when we reach the 5-minute rule it is my intention to move to strike out the enacting clause, so that we can vote to kill it and go home.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see so many distinguished colleagues of mine defending the rights of aliens to come here for the purpose of doing something detrimental to our people. I see quite a legal battery talking about the Constitution. I do not think one of them as yet has referred to the bill. In order to satisfy my distinguished colleagues who are afraid of the Constitution, and in order to satisfy my other colleagues who are afraid these aliens would be denied free speech, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be recommitted to the committee, and the committee can call in the Attorney General and the other departments to get their opinion as to the constitutionality of this proposed legislation and whether it is advisable to submit it.

Mr. RANKIN. Well, what is the gentleman's request? He did not want to put in the unanimous-consent request anything about the Attorney General?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No. I am putting in nothing. I just made the suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. That request is not in order in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. I do not understand what the parliamentary status is now.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no motion pending. The gentleman simply made a request that cannot be granted in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. As I understand it, the gentleman from New York made a unanimous consent request that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration?

The CHAIRMAN. That request cannot be granted in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MARTIN of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill, H. R. 27, directed him to report that it had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 27, which has just been under consideration in the Committee of the Whole, be recommitted to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks relative to our loss in the sudden passing yesterday of that outstanding hero of the Spanish-American War, Rear Admiral Hobson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks made today on the bill H. R. 3679.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a speech delivered over the radio this afternoon by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter from the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Delaware?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ADSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COLE of New York, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. DUNCAN, for 1 week, on account of death of his father.

To Mr. DREW, for the balance of the week, on account of illness in family.

To Mr. MAHON of South Carolina, for Thursday, on account of death in family.

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 361. An act to further extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Garrison, N. Dak.;
